This is a specific matter because on Friday the whole work force of 220 people was called into the canteen and given 90 days' notice of the closure of the factory. Of that work force, 58 per cent. are women and the sole breadwinners in their homes and 57 per cent. are under 21 years of age and in their first real job.

It is urgent because the House, by debating the issue, can prevent the closure of this viable factory which makes clothes for such companies as Mothercare and Marks and Spencer. It is urgent because the factory has a full order book and is being closed only for reasons of internal politics at Courtaulds. An urgent debate is needed because the work force has issued a statement saying that it will consider any method of non-violent, direct action to secure the future of their jobs and prosperity.

The House must ensure that the company opens the books to the work force and that, if Courtaulds does not want to continue to operate that factory, a workers' co-operative is able to do so in co-operation with the companies for which the factory now produces goods. The issue is especially urgent because it is happening on Merseyside, where unemployment is at its highest ever and already running at 30 per cent. in Bootle and Seaforth. If the redundancy notices stand, the highly flexible, skilled work force is likely to be on the dole for some considerable time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"The proposed closure of the Courtaulds factory at Seaforth in the constituency of Bootle."

I regret that I must give the hon. Member the same answer that I gave to the other hon. Members making Standing Order No. 10 applications. I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot therefore submit his application to the House, but I hope that he will find other methods of raising the matter, which is of concern to his constituents.

Prime Minister (Share Dealings)

4.19 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"Prime ministerial conflict of interests in relation to share dealings."

The matter is specific, Mr. Speaker, because it refers to the head of the Government in the United Kingdom dealing in shares from 10 Downing street and using that building as an arm of the stock exchange.

It is also specific because it has always been generally understood in the House that, like councillors and others who represent the public in matters of accountability, Government Ministers, including the Prime Minister, do not become involved in dealing in shares because they are privy to inside information that the ordinary public does not have. In these days of privatisation, there have been countless instances when the Government and the Prime Minister have been and were privy to such information and could have made millions.

The matter is important because there is a conflict of interests. It is not right and proper that in these days of massive speculation on the stock exchange, when the Financial Times index has gone through the 1,400 barrier, we should dismiss lightly the fact that a Prime Minister has been dealing in shares.

The matter is important because No. 10 Downing street does not belong to the Prime Minister but to the nation, and it is used for Cabinet meetings every week. It is also used for Budgets, and announcements are made by the Prime Minister and many other Ministers with advance information that could lead to a lot of money being made by a lot of people. That is why it has been generally agreed over the years that Ministers and Prime Ministers do not become involved in speculation. The matter is also important because it is set against a backcloth of City fraud that has been unsurpassed in these many years. I do not have to go further down that road.

The matter is also important because of the public disquiet about it and because many people — I am among them — believe that there should be a full and independent public inquiry into the whole matter so that the people can judge for themselves.

The matter is urgent because it has occurred since the House last met on Friday and because the Prime Minister has refused to come to the House today, as she should have done, to make a Prime Ministerial statement to explain the matter. It is also urgent because the Committee considering the Financial Services Bill is meeting upstairs and one of its jobs is to clear up the question of conflict of interests as it applies to people in the City of London and Ministers.

The matter is important, urgent and specific. We might have gone to the Director of Public Prosecutions but we have no faith in him.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing an important and specific matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"Prime ministerial conflict of interests relating to share dealings."

I have listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and, therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Mr. Skinner: It will not go away.

Parliamentary Language

4.22 pm

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On Thursday, during exchanges between the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) and my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Islington, North suggested that some hon. Members might be persuaded not to take up immigration cases because they were racist. Such language is unparliamentary, and I would invite you, Mr. Speaker, to ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw that allegation. I raised the matter with you on Thursday and you informed me that you had not heard that remark. I must inform you that Hansard did, and it appears in the official record.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving me notice of his point of order. As I said on Thursday, I did not hear that remark. Indeed, I do not think that many did, because the matter was not raised with me at the time. However, as the hon. Gentleman said, it is now printed in Hansard. I repeat what I said on Thursday and add that in the words of "Erskine May":

"Good temper and moderation are the characteristics of parliamentary language"

I hope that we shall conduct our debates on that high plane.

BILL PRESENTED

SEXUAL OFFENCES ACT 1956 (AMENDMENT)

Mr. Graham Bright, supported by Mr. Alex Carlile, Mr. Ken Weetch, Mr. Nicholas Lyell, Mr. Gareth Wardell and Mr. Jerry Hayes, presented a Bill to amend section 6 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 11 April and to be printed. [Bill 118.]

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [18 March].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the national Debt and public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply;
(b) for refunding any amount of tax;
(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies and importations; or
(d) for any relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.—[Mr. Lawson.]

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

[Relevant documents: European Community Document No. 9792/85, Annual Economic Report 1985-86 and the unnumbered document, Annual Economic Report 1985-86 (final version as adopted by the Council).]

Mr. Speaker: No fewer than 27 right hon. and hon. Members have applied to speak and eight of them are Privy Councillors. In fairness to the House, I propose to interleave the calling of Privy Councillors with Back-Benchers and I propose to adopt a 10-minute limit on speeches between 7 pm and 8.50 pm. I hope that the Privy Councillors who are called before that time will bear that limit broadly in mind.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Norman Tebbit): My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has presented to the House a Budget which carries forward the objectives of this Conservative Government.

No Budget can stand alone, and I am glad to see that many commentators have noted the manner in which, in many respects, this Budget has taken further the aims and reforms of earlier Budgets. It is a Budget that continues the drive towards the kind of economic way of life—a freer way of life—which has been endorsed twice by the electorate of this country, and will be endorsed again.

No one on this side of the House has ever deluded himself into a belief in instant prescriptions. When we set out in 1979, we said that we were setting out on a long and difficult task. The world recession made the task more difficult, as did that final futile spasm of the old guard anti-democratic union bosses, the coal strike. They have both been overcome.

We had a coherent view of how the reversal of our relative economic and industrial decline could be achieved. It is a view which experience has reinforced. The cornerstone of the work has been the reduction and control of inflation. Friday's figures for the retail price index and my right hon. Friend's forecast of 3½ per cent. inflation by the end of this year, when compared with an average level of inflation at 15½ per cent. during the previous Labour Government, underline this achievement.

[Mr. Norman Tebbit]

Of course, our success on that front has led some to forget the dangers of inflation. Indeed the question is sometimes put, should not we be prepared to accept a little more inflation to create more jobs? Memory should not be so short. It is not that long ago that, in that graphic phrase of the day, Britain was drinking in the last chance saloon, and yet even now there are those who would dash straight back in and call for another round—a round of spending and borrowing that would give us another inflationary hangover — [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) may not be old enough to remember it, but it was fewer than 10 years ago.

Those were the days so rightly condemned by the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) who in 1976 said:

"Higher inflation, followed by higher unemployment. That is the history of the last twenty years".

He was speaking of the 20 years from 1956 to 1976.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) spoke for almost everyone when, according to The Times of 18 March 1976, he told the Labour party:

"There is a direct relationship between the level of pay received by those who have a job and the number of jobs the economy can support".

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) put it in even harder and clearer terms when he said that "inflation, if left unchecked, presents the biggest single threat to the standard of living of every person in the land".

In contrast to our Labour predecessors, we have not been limited to occasional pious thoughts on these matters. We have taken the necessary actions, consistently over a period. To defeat inflation requires a consistency of purpose, a consistency of action, and yields a consistency of effect. Too many Chancellors in the past have been forced into mismanagement by the call for instant solutions. They converted economic cycles into roller-coaster rides that left the stomach in the mouth.

As we know, for many years in each successive cycle the peak of inflation was higher than its predecessor. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, in his Chancellorship, broke that precedent. My right hon. Friend has built upon his success.

There is no safe level of inflation. It is the job of Government, through sound monetary and fiscal policies, to ensure——

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Oh!

Mr. Tebbit: I shall read the figures to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) if he is not clear about it.

It is the job of Government to ensure that there is both consistent downward pressure on inflation and room for growth in the economy. Of course, success in overcoming inflation cannot guarantee a fall in unemployment, but a rise in inflation will certainly lead inexorably to an increase in unemployment. Cause and effect are not near simultaneous. Jobs are not lost as soon as prices go up, nor are they recreated quickly when prices are brought under control. None the less, the benefits of a steady and consistent approach can be seen. Since the sharp and deep recession, we have seen five years of economic growth alongside a sizeable reduction in inflation. As my right hon. Friend said, 1986 is set for output growth of 3 per cent. and inflation falling to 3·5 per cent. It is a record many ex-Chancellors would have dearly wished for during their term of office.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): It is an economy for the whizz kids.

Mr. Tebbit: In real terms, we now have an economy, and an industry, including manufacturing, which is growing, not declining. It suits the Opposition not to hear the facts. The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) in particular finds difficulty in hearing while he is talking, and I suggest he stops talking.

Total fixed investment in the economy last year was at an all time record in real terms. The CBI's latest trends inquiry gives the best combined response on prospects for output and prices since the inquiries began in 1975. Manufacturing exports are at an all time high. Of course the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) will no doubt remind us that we have a deficit on our trade in manufactured goods. That is a tendency which has been growing — consistently exports were growing less quickly than imports—during the period of the last Labour Government as well as this Government. Manufacturing profitability is at its best since 1973 and productivity has increased by an average of 6 per cent. a year over the past five years.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way so early in his speech. In the interests of accuracy, will he point out that there was a substantial surplus on the balance of trade in manufactured goods when the Government took office? Now, for the first time in our history, there is a substantial deficit, and we are heading for a deficit of £4·5 billion. Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us how, under this wise Government, this has come about?

Mr. Tebbit: I said that there was a long established tendency in that direction because manufacturing exports were growing less quickly than manufacturing imports. That is not a new feature. It has continued and, not unnaturally, if such a tendency continues for long enough one moves from surplus into deficit.

In the meantime, in contrast to the Labour Government, we have maintained consistently a surplus on balance of payments.

Mr. Smith: What about oil?

Mr. Tebbit: Here we go again. I wonder whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman would say that in such a dismissive way if it was coal? What is wrong with exporting oil? It is not many weeks since the right hon. and learned Gentleman was saying that the whole of our strategy depended on revenue from oil. We have lost half of that in a matter of weeks. The economy still looks to be in very good shape.

It is only fair to recognise that some industrial capacity has been lost. It is only fair to agree that our competitors have not stood still waiting for us to catch up. We have begun to close the gap. Of course there are effects on unemployment. Our competitors have shed labour in manufacturing industry as they have raised productivity faster than demand has expanded and we have had to go faster still to close the gap in competitiveness.

A sign of the strength of the recovery is shown by recent figures for the mechanical engineering industry. This strength of recovery is most notable in the output of the machine tool industry — a business in which the Opposition would have written us off years ago. Output rose by 20 per cent. last year, and that was the first rise for a long time.

Those in industry see good prospects and are encouraged by the Budget, despite the halving of oil revenues. It is fair to ask, in the light of what the right hon. and learned Gentleman and others have said on the matter, how the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) would have reacted to the dramatic change in oil prices had he been Chancellor. I imagine that, as usual, he would have over-reacted. People often do under stress, and he would have the stress of commitments to an extra £24 billion a year of public expenditure—alongside self denial of £4 billion to £5 billion of revenue from privatisation. He would have to wheel out the whole dreary paraphernalia of state intervention — the National Enterprise Board, the National Investment Bank, planning agreements and the like, with reactionary union bosses forced on to company boards while the right hon. Gentleman's penal tax policies would drive our most talented managers either to despair or to California. For luck he would direct pension funds money into a new generation of Meriden co-operatives, Scottish Daily News's, and the like. We know how he would react. We have seen him in office in the past when he was Secretary of State for Prices and Consumer Protection or, as his local newspaper the Birmingham Post referred to him, "Mr. Rising Price".

In an article in the Birmingham Post the right hon. Gentleman said:

> "We spent a lot of time in the last month looking at potato prices . . . once the drought has worked its way through and the pound has stabilised, we can expect a period when the inflation rate is going to move down again. We are on course, but we are travelling more slowly than we would have wished to".

Thus it would be back to the consideration of the price of potatoes by some wretched board and some other unfortunate Minister spending more time on that than ministerial duties warranted. [Interruption.] The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook says he would like to attack his record and is most willing to do so. We now have the prospect of stable prices and low taxes—the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook could not control the price of potatoes—with individuals and companies able to take their decisions in a free market, with fewer state monopolies, less state intervention, less fiscal bias and freedom to allow incentives to work and rewards to be available for hard work and success.

It is free enterprise and free consumers, not Governments, that will continue the process of creating jobs. The measures we have seen in this Budget and earlier Budgets show clearly how the prospect can be realised.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Why is my right hon. Friend being so selective in his attack on the Opposition Front Bench? Would he care to comment on the proposal of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) to double the expenditure of the Trade and Industry Department? Will he comment on the effect of that and its cost upon our national finances and economic situation?

Mr. John Smith: Watch out, it is a trap.

Mr. Tebbit: Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman will be kind enough to allow me to answer the question. I am always extremely selective in what I say about the Opposition Front Bench. I select each of them in turn. I treat them with great courtesy and I tell the truth about them, which is a sad thing to have to do. My hon. Friend is right. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has proposed a massive increase in spending through the DTI.

Mr. Smith: Not doubling the expenditure.

Mr. Tebbit: I do not know whether it is double or merely 50 per cent. I do know that when the right hon. and learned Gentleman's Government left office there was massive spending in the DTI, not on new technologies or on bringing forward new industries, but on loss subsidies on the old fashioned state industries because they could not bear to deal with those industries' problems.

It is essential that tax reductions should be made where they do most good and that they should be matched by tax reform to ensure that tax does the least possible damage to incentives and enterprise and the maximum possible to promote a growing, flexible and responsive economy. One welcome consequence is the cut in tax on unincorporated businesses and the matching cut in corporation tax for small companies. This is only the latest in a series of reforms that have transformed the tax environment for business.

Perhaps most important, the business tax reform of 1984 is now coming fully into effect—a cut in special tax reliefs matched by a cut in corporation tax rates. The main rate in 1986-87 is down to 35 per cent., which is the lowest rate in any major industrial country, and the small companies rate is only 29 per cent., which is the marginal rate for about 90 per cent. of unincorporated businesses. The result is not a fall in revenue—far from it.

The aim of the reforms is to reduce distortion, to improve the quality of investment and to strengthen incentives to enterprise and growth. Of key importance is the aim to see the basic rate of taxation down to 25 per cent. I understand that that aim is shared by the Social Democratic and Liberal parties. I take it that that is why they will vote against the 1 per cent. cut in the basic rate tonight.

Many of our critics may say of our tax policy, "Jam tomorrow". We already have a lower basic rate than at any time since the second world war. It is four percentage points down so far and there is the prospect of more to come. It is jam tomorrow — just like yesterday and today. Under this Government, the incentives to enterprise will grow. Schemes to encourage employee shareholders will bring a greater identity of interests between workers and their firms. It is dividends in the pockets of workers that may do more to increase harmony in the factories than union bosses in board rooms. These Budget measures will help to create jobs in the economy. At the same time, more direct help will be given to help the long-term unemployed back into work by individual advice, training and allowances for those who take jobs on less than £80 a week.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) must be easily patronised — he said that he found these measures patronising — if he finds these measures patronising. They are a positive reponse to those who must feel left behind as others—some 400,000 in February alone — enter and leave the unemployment register. The increase of 55,000 in the community programme and of 35,000 in the number of enterprise allowance places offer renewed scope for those on the unemployment register to get back into work.

Mr. Foulkes: Rubbish.

Mr. Tebbit: There are limits, however, on how far it is possible to substitute Government schemes for jobs created in the market place without destroying more jobs. For many years, the United Kingdom suffered economic decline relative to our competitors. That has been halted or reversed.

Mr. Foulkes: Rubbish.

Mr. Tebbit: The hon. Gentleman says, "Rubbish". He should examine the facts. Since 1979, we have grown at the same rate as France and Germany.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): A real comedian.

Mr. Tebbit: In 1983 and 1985, the United Kingdom topped the European Community growth league. Productivity growth in the United Kingdom's economy as a whole since 1980 has been much higher than that in France or Germany. Those are the facts, although Opposition Members may not like them.

Our growth in manufacturing productivity since 1979 has been second only to Japan among the seven major industrial countries. Since 1981, United Kingdom manufacturing exports have grown at least as fast as world trade. The average of United Kingdom inflation, as compared to inflation in the OECD, has fallen from being 60 per cent. higher under the Labour Government to only some 10 per cent. higher between June 1983 and December 1985. In absolute terms, the average level of inflation in the United Kingdom under Labour stood more than six percentage points above that of our competitors, whereas in this Parliament it has been only one fifth of 1 per cent. higher.

Mr. Winnick: If there is such a success story, and if enterprise culture, as the Chancellor described it last week, works, why does mass unemployment continue and why are many of our fellow citizens denied the opportunity to work? Why is the number of people who have been jobless for one year or more increasing? Is the right hon. Gentleman saying that unemployment will be substantially lower by next year's Budget?

Mr. Tebbit: The hon. Gentleman knows better than to try to tempt an ex-Employment Minister of any party to forecast unemployment.

Mr. Winnick: Answer my question.

Mr. Tebbit: I have explained more than once that jobs can be lost very swiftly and that they take a long time to regain. [Interruption.] That certainly applies to Labour Governments. They never last long and take a long time to get back into office.

Perhaps I might explain to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) once again that, in 1979, our average productivity levels, especially in manufacturing industry, were way below those of our rivals. We would have had to shed many jobs just to reach the level that they were at in 1979. Since then, they have got further ahead. We are still pursuing them and having to shed jobs in many areas to reach the new levels. If the hon. Gentleman does not understand that, he has understood very little of his life so far. He has only to ask that great patron of the Labour party, Mr. Robert Maxwell, how many people he will have to dismiss from his newspaper to achieve productivity levels found in the rest of the world to get an answer to part of his question about unemployment.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): How does my right hon. Friend explain the fact that there are more long-term unemployed in the south of England than in the north, where I come from, when it is clear to everyone that the south is far more prosperous?

Mr. Tebbit: That is a matter which may be explained better as my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment's plan for counselling and advice for those who have been unemployed for more than a year works through the country.

Our record on inflation is far better than that of the Labour Government, when the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and Mrs. Shirley Williams tried to control prices. So, as the hon. Member for Walsall, North asked, are the jobs that we would expect to be generated by the growing and more productive economy appearing?

Mr. Foulkes: No.

Mr. Tebbit: On the contrary. To an extent they are —680,000 new jobs have been created since June 1983. That is better than the rest of the Community put together. [HON. MEMBERS: "They are the wrong jobs."] They are, none the less, jobs which people are very pleased to have. However, that is plainly not enough. The past five years of manufacturing output growth, now 13 per cent. above its lowest point in 1981, have been reflected not in gains in new jobs but in long overdue gains in productivity, without which there would have been even more closures and even more job losses, as I have just expained to the hon Member for Walsall, North, although I doubt whether he has yet caught on to the point.

The major obstacle to translating that productivity performance into new jobs is the tendency of unit labour costs, fuelled by high wage increases, to outstrip those of our competitors. The problem is not peculiar to the past few years. From 1974 to 1979 there was a relative decline of 25 per cent. in our international competitiveness. Our better performance recently is still not good enough. Industry must control its unit labour costs.

Faced with reality in 1976, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) called for a cut in living standards. He limited pay rises to 5 per cent. when inflation was running at more than 20 per cent. That would be the equivalent of a 10 per cent. pay cut with inflation at 5 per cent. as today. My right hon. Friend is certainly not asking for that, but we cannot exploit our improving productivity and output performance to create enough new jobs until earnings come back more closely into line with increases in productivity and our unit labour costs match those of our main competitor countries. That does not mean wage cuts. Those in work can enjoy an improving real level of earnings, as they have done under this Government — some 2·1 per cent. growth in real earnings per annum compared to less than half of 1 per cent. during the period of the Labour Government.

However, although those pay increases must be related to productivity and competition, as taxes are cut and inflation reduced, low pay rises can still mean a sharply improving standard of living. Moderation in pay helps, above all, the unemployed to be priced back into work. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley may sneer, but I shall return to this point later. This Budget, like its predecessors, improves the climate for job creation, but neither it nor any Budget can create——

Mr. Heffer: Rubbish.

Mr. Tebbit: The hon. Gentleman is going on a little. He may one day learn something, and, even if it takes us from the time that he is seven until he is 70, we shall keep trying.

This Budget improves the climate for job creation, but neither it nor any Budget can guarantee that jobs will be created. Foolish pay increases: strikes, poor management, bad product design or indifferent after-sales support, obsolete technology — any one of these can destroy existing jobs or abort new ones. Nor is the process immediate. A customer may be quickly lost and it may take years to regain his favour. The economic facts of life do not change with changes of Government, much as the Opposition Front Bench would like us to believe.

It is instructive to look back 10 years and to see how a Labour Government fared. From his sixth Budget in April 1976, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East careered on through that year along to his ninth Budget in December, swinging from wild and foolish boasting of success to come to dire threats of disaster just ahead. A Labour party press release captures the more windy and vainglorious mood. It says:

"The right hon. Denis Healey, Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking at the Annual Dinner of Edinburgh East Labour Party . . . said:—'The new 4½ per cent. pay agreement between the Labour Government and the TUC can transform our prospects . . . It means we can be on top of inflation within eighteen months from now. It means more jobs and more in the shopping basket'"— every prediction was wrong. He went on:

"Already the tributes to this achievement are pouring in from all over the world".

He might have added, "except from the TUC and the trades union members."

As we look back on the sad tale of broken pledges, we can see the huge borrowings and humiliation that came to the right hon. Gentleman at the hands of the International Monetary Fund. Hence the calls that he made for savage cuts in the standard of living for millions of ordinary workers. The deficit on our invisible trade grew, unemployment grew and the whole mess grew worse until it collapsed in the winter of discontent. Would it be any different next time?

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): Yes.

Mr. Tebbit: It would be worse. In those days, the Leader of the Opposition was one of a small minority undermining the then Chancellor. Next time, he would be in No. 10 undermining his own Chancellor, if he had the chance.

On Tuesday last, the Leader of the Opposition was put up to say that this Government have borrowed more than any other Government in history. Of course, I am sure that his scriptwriters knew, even if they did not tell him, that in real terms they have done nothing of the sort. The PSBR has been brought down from 9·5 per cent. of GDP in 1975-76 to a Budget forecast of 2 per cent. in 1985-86. Inflation has fallen from 26·9 per cent. in August 1975 to about 5 per cent. for a comparable period 10 years on. The two sets of figures are not coincidental.

Mr. Bell: What would be the public sector borrowing requirement without asset sales?

Mr. Tebbit: Higher, but there is nothing wrong with asset sales.

In contrast to the strictures on borrowing, on Wednesday of last week, the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook sought to remove what he termed our prejudice against borrowing. He and the Leader of the Opposition should get their act together. Are they for more borrowing or for less? Are they set once again to go down what the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth called the primrose path together, hand in hand?

They are for more borrowing—and not just a little more but a lot more. Last Wednesday my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) asked the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook by how much borrowing would go up. The right hon. Gentleman said he would give the figures, but failed to do so. As he has had some time to think since last Wednesday, I am prepared to give way to him so that he can let us have the figures now. By how much would borrowing go up under a Labour Government? If the right hon. Gentleman will not tell us the answer, we have to do the sums for him, and we shall keep doing the sums and adding them up.

During the debate over the past few days, Labour Members have criticised the Budget, but how proud the right hon. Member for Leeds, East would have been if he could have presented a Budget that was so popular and effective. Labour Members have said that the Budget does nothing for the poor, nothing for jobs, and is all for the rich. Nothing could be further from the truth. The Budget continues the attack on inflation, the cruellest tax which falls most heavily on the poor, not on the wealthy, who have assets to set against it. This tax is one of the worst agents of job destruction. Labour Members ignore the growing economy, which is the source of new jobs. They ignore the further direct employment measures that add to those announced in the autumn statement.

From time to time the Opposition have given us some glimpses, obscure and contradictory, of their economic policies. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook does not want to tell us about the key to it—how much they would borrow. He refuses every invitation to give us those figures. We have seen it all before. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East said:

"we are obliged to spell out precisely where the jobs will come from and the consequential effects on inflation, on the balance of payments and on borrowing."—[Official Report, 20 March 1986; Vol 94, c. 438.]

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East will not thank the hon. Gentleman for that, and nor will the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East said that it is important to cost everything in detail—he would say that, would he not?

Nor will we allow the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook to present only those aspects of his policies which he believes would appeal most—that is his call to the many to confiscate from the few. It would not be a joke if the right hon. Gentleman's borrowings and taxings ever came to pass, any more than it was when the right hon. Member for Leeds, East was calling for savage cuts in the standard of living. We shall make sure that all the measures proposed by the Labour party will be considered together. We shall see to what levels of taxes or borrowing they would bring us.

[Mr. Tebbit]

I notice that the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) has not managed to attend the debate today. He has a plan for sneaking through the middle unnoticed. He expects to give a stimulus to the economy, modest in size but far-reaching in its effects. He just cannot let go of that old demand lever. He and his colleagues would take back the 1p reduction in the basic rate of tax, and they would be back into the game of demand management.

The alliance foresees a 50 per cent. increase in the size of the PSBR. Since the Budget there has been a fall of 1 per cent. in interest rates. How adverse a reaction—by contrast with that vote of confidence, and that of the stock market—would there be on interest rates and inflation if we were to follow the course advocated by the right hon. Member for Hillhead? He would not carry the confidence of industry or the markets. Nor would industry welcome his incomes policy proposals. The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) says that we must not have a low-paid, low-skill economy. I agree. But by putting Government controls in place of a free market for jobs and skills, that is what he would bring about.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Member for Stockton and Barclays.

Mr. Tebbit: I do not think that I need any interventions from the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). I am looking forward to the uncouth sneer being swiped off his face when his attack on the Prime Minister is put in its place very firmly indeed. He will regret having made a fool of himself, just as the right hon. Member for Hillhead will do.

We can see plainly the alternatives to the skilful Budget of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. The Labour party's approach would be to go straight back to 1976 as fast as it could and straight back to a siege economy. The Liberals and the SDP would get there by a more devious and slower route — what those with long political memories would call the Bassetlaw by-election approach.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Those with not so very long political memories recall that when my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) was Chancellor of the Exchequer there were 600,000 unemployed and we had a negative PSBR.

Mr. Tebbit: Those with long political memories will also remember the conduct of the right hon. Member for Hillhead. We recollect the Bassetlaw affair, which was typical of the style of that Government and of the right hon. Gentleman. Two days before the Bassetlaw by-election Mrs. Castle swore that there was no economic freeze on the way. But, just a matter of weeks later, the right hon. Member for Hillhead, as the Labour Chancellor of the Exchequer, announced £250 million of additional taxation, new action to tighten the credit squeeze and all the normal paraphernalia of a Labour Budget. That is the Bassetlaw factor, and it is typical of SDP policies.

We have no urge to go back to the policies from which our ills have sprung. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook is familiar with this story as he was a supporter of that Labour Government and of the right hon. Member for Hillhead. By contrast, our policies will bring us to where we can see not only an improvement in this country's relative economic position but steady growth in the economy. That is the only way—although nobody would deny that it is a slow and difficult road—to generate enough new jobs to overcome rising unemployment.

Our objectives, to which the Budget is addressed, are to further the development in this country of a new economic liberalism, or people's capitalism — call it what one will. It means people setting up in their own businesses — and 750,000 have done so under this Government. It means people owning the homes in which they live — and more than 800,000 former council tenants now do so in the teeth of opposition from Labour Members. It means people owning shares, joining in the task of providing the capital to build our industry, and determining its future and theirs. Under this Government the number of those owning shares has more than doubled, and this Budget will mean that more can do so.

It means more people owning a stake in the firm in which they work, sharing in its risks and its rewards. More than 1 million employees now take part in share schemes — [Interruption.] Opposition Members may sneer and laugh. They do not like people owning shares in businesses. Above all, they do not like trade unionists doing so. But we want many more to own shares.

The Budget means people keeping more of their income to determine for themselves how it should be saved or spent. It means more individuals and more companies contributing their own money to charities, and helping one another directly. It means more people owning their own pensions. It means more people running their own trade unions. That is something that the Labour Front Bench refuses to accept. It means people knowing that they can seek work without closed shop restrictions, or finding that employers are forced to pay too much, and cannot afford to take them on. It means people being free to choose where and how to invest, without restrictions and distortions, so as to create the wealth that is needed and to create the jobs that are needed.

Those are the Government's and the Budget's objectives. They are the right ones for the country. The Budget takes us in the right direction, towards those objectives, and I commend it to the House.

5.4 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I shall try hard to avoid being drawn into all the irrelevancies of the peroration of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, but I am sure that he will forgive me if I touch lightly on one point. He commended a change in trade union attitudes, for which he accepted responsibility. On behalf of the whole Labour and trade union movement, may I say a very genuine and warm "thank you" to him for instituting the political fund ballot? I think that all the ballots have now been held, and every single one of them has confirmed by a large majority the decision of British trade unions to have political funds. Indeed, some trade unions, which had failed to get political funds before, were able, in the wave of opinion generated by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—[Interruption.]

Mr. Tebbit: I am most grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for seeing the good sense of my plans, which he and his colleagues opposed. However, if the facts had been set out fairly in any of those ballots, the result might have gone the other way. But that is the rub of the green. I accept the democratic process, and I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will also accept it when it goes against him.

Mr. Smith: If the right hon. Gentleman has any complaint about the conduct of those elections, and if that is his excuse, he should take up the matter with the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies. I am sure that he will listen to any complaints. But instead of congratulating the trade unions, the right hon. Gentleman has to concoct another smear. That is typical of him.

There is a rumour among trade unions that there is a trophy called the Margaret Thatcher challenge trophy, which was to be given to the union with the highest yes vote in the ballot. The union is now wondering what to do with it. I suggest that it should present it to the right hon. Gentleman, with the grateful thanks of all concerned.

Mr. Winnick: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is widely believed that companies should do precisely the same as trade unions, and should have a ballot before donating to political causes? Is it not remarkable that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster should lecture everyone about democracy when he has not been elected to his position as chairman of the Tory party? Why is there no elementary democracy in the Tory party?

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding me about that. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is always saying that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, so now that he is chairman of the Tory party perhaps he will tell us—[HON. MEMBERS: "Talk about the Budget."] The right hon. Gentleman distracted me and I am sure, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you will bear witness to that. I do want to deal with the Budget. But the right hon. Gentleman has an opportunity now, as chairman of the Conservative party, to acquire a reputation for consistency and fairness and to propose, in the next legislative Session, similar treatment for companies in their donations to his party.

In recent years it has been customary for the final day of debate on the Budget to cover matters relating to trade and industry. It is usual for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to open the debate. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster criticised the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) for not being here, and would no doubt be ready to criticise any other hon. Member for not being here. But he should perhaps note that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is not here, and that as far as I can see not a single member of that Department has seen fit to come to the Chamber for the debate.

It was appropriate for the Chancellor of the Duchy to speak in the debate last year, because he was then the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. This year, however, he appears in a different guise. I wonder why he decided to speak in this debate. Is he worried that he might somehow be forgotten if he does not manage to speak in debates in the Chamber? Why did he elbow aside either the Paymaster General or the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in order to speak in this debate? Once again the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was unfortunate. Where is he? Is he or his Ministers away negotiating some other deal to sell off another part of British industry?

There is one happy feature about the right hon. Gentleman being here and it is that he is closely involved in the affairs that may be keeping the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry away from the Chamber. When he was Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, did not the right hon. Gentleman invite General Motors to make an application to take over Leyland Vehicles and Land Rover? Was he not the Minister responsible for starting the secret talks that went on for 18 months until they were flushed out by the Opposition when we found out the information and challenged Ministers?

The right hon. Gentleman appears to have been involved in bringing the talks to an end. Has he reflected since what they were all about? Last Sunday The Observer told us about the right hon. Gentleman's activities. We were given a blow-by-blow account of these frenetic negotiations. The Observer said:

> "All week they had been in discussions with Mr. Channon and his officials—with Mr. Norman Tebbit coming in and out. The effort was to find a compromise formula that would be palatable to the backbenchers.
> On Wednesday they thought they had agreement on the 49-51 principle with GM eventually taking the majority after it had proved its 'good citizenship'.
> Then Mr. Channon came back, saying this would not work, and suggested . . . an overseeing board".

In view of his close involvement in these matters the right hon. Gentleman might have told us something about that. After all, we are discussing trade and industry and the motor vehicle industry is an important matter for us in the Budget. The right hon. Gentleman has a direct and personal responsibility for the fiasco that the whole British Leyland affair has become. If a charge of anti-Americanism is to be flung at anyone, what about a company like General Motors that spent £1 million on a wild goose chase? Will that company not feel that there is a tinge of anti-Americanism in this Conservative Government—and a rather expensive one at that?

Mr. Tebbit: I hope that the press release of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech is now over. He has been on his feet for nearly 10 minutes. Perhaps now we could get on with the debate on the Budget—not least as the whole Treasury team is here eager to discuss the Budget and to hear what level of PSBR the right hon. and learned Gentleman thinks there ought to be in a Socialist Budget. The team is also eager, as am I, to take him to one side later on and show him several different versions in several different newspapers of the recent talks.

Mr. Smith: The easiest way of solving that problem is for the Government to tell us what is going on. They have had many opportunities to do that and if there is a problem of misrepresentation it can be cleared up.

Mr. Hickmet rose——

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman is stopping me from getting on with the Budget, but I shall give way.

Mr. Hickmet: The right hon. and learned Gentleman's party made its position clear on the link between General Motors and British Leyland. It does not want that link at any price. How will he react if, for example, the operations of General Motors in Britain are wound down as a result of the policy that his party has adopted?

Mr. Smith: I hope the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster will forgive me if I answer that intervention, even though it means I shall have to talk a little bit longer. It is an odd conclusion to draw, is it not, that when the Government initiate a project that invites General Motors to acquire parts of British Leyland and that project does not come off, if General Motors then decides to do something with its plant, that is the responsibility of the Opposition. That is a new one on me.

[Mr. Smith]

Whether in his role as chairman of the Conservative party or as an ex-Secretary of State, the right hon. Gentleman had a shot at defending the Budget. However, he made very little attempt to deal with trade and industry. He said little about manufacturing industry and gave us a rather lame and tendentious explanation about the debilitating balance of trade deficit on manufactured goods. There was a substantial surplus when the Government took office and now we are heading for a £4 million deficit. No explanation has been offered about why that has happened under this wise and beneficent Government, and the right hon. Gentleman did not even give us a clue about an explanation.

We know that for a long time there has been what one might call massive scepticism by the Government about manufacturing industry. I know they are trying hard to change their tune, but in 1981 the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in a memorable phrase:

"I do not understand the importance which the Opposition and some Tories give to manufacturing industry."

That is on the record. It is as notable as his other famous prediction that young people in Britain would get not so much low-tech as no-tech jobs. The Chancellor can deny it if he likes but he made both of those statements.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): That sort of dishonest quotation does not serve any purpose. The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not give the full text. What I said was that, although high technology had an important part to play in future, many future jobs would not be so much low-tech as no-tech. I did not say all jobs: I said many of them. That is a fact in the United States and here.

Mr. Smith: The right hon. Gentleman appears to concede that I quoted him correctly. I am not being accused, nor could I reasonably be so accused, of misquoting him. I said, "not so much low-tech as no-tech" and in his intervention the right hon. Gentleman quoted the very words I used. His excuse is that he did not say all the jobs would be low-tech, just many of them. [Interruption.] If we go on the way we are going, that will be the result of the Government's policies. The right hon. Gentleman might learn something by listening, so let me repeat what I said. If the Government continue with their present policies, that will be the result.

What an ambition for our young people! Let us give them high-tech jobs. Would not that be a better ambition for the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government? As many as possible of our young people should be obtaining high-tech jobs, and we would be going in that direction if the Government were not turning them away from technical colleges and polytechnics and universities and were encouraging them to stay on at school. [Interruption.] When someone talks about opportunity, all the Government can think about is money. They can never draw the balance between the enjoyment of human opportunity and the reasonable investment required to achieve it.

The Chancellor is trying to change his stance. We saw a rather pathetic attempt at that in his intervention. That is because he is beginning to realise that the plan that was there before will not work. That plan was that Britain could live off service industries and oil revenues and the remittances from foreign investments. It was felt that we could get by quite nicely on that and the Government did not need to worry too much about manufacturing industry. We heard all the speeches at that time about the undue importance attached to manufacturing industry, but even the Chancellor now realises that a number of things are changing. The nation is becoming more and more convinced that the catastrophic consequences of a decline in our manufacturing industry are quite unbearable.

The Aldington report was published last year. All that gets from the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a snigger. The distinguished authors of that report were rubbished before the ink was dry on the document. Not only was it turned down without being read, but attacks were made on its individual authors. That report makes good reading for anyone who wants to understand Britain's industrial predicament. It said what would happen when the volume of North sea oil declined. The report was not able to predict any more than the Government were able to predict that the value of North sea oil would decline in an even shorter period. That has accentuated the problem and the Chancellor knows that more than anyone else in the House, or at least he ought to.

We have now been brought close to the reality of our economic position. North sea oil is not so obviously helping us. Of course it is still of enormous benefit to the Government, although not as much benefit as it was, but still useful in terms of balance of payments and our overall balance of trade and Government revenue. To this Government it has meant tens of billions of pounds and yet they have wasted most of that money. They have had those funds in a way that no other Government have ever had them. They have had that money without having to go through the complicated business of raising it by taxation or by cutting expenditure. [Interruption.] It was taxation which the Government inherited. North sea oil was on stream in 1980 and the Government inherited the revenues. What point are the Government seeking to make? If they are saying that they did not have a marvellous windfall of North sea oil revenues, no one will believe them. [Interruption.] I should like to say what the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster kept saying to my colleagues—if the right hon. Gentleman would listen occasionally, he might learn something to his benefit.

That is why there is apprehension about the crumbling technological base of our manufacturing industry. The failure to invest in British manufacturing industry, to develop our research and development and to provide proper training within industry are at the root of our economic problems.

I should like to consider quickly some of the facts. Manufacturing output stagnated in 1985 and is still 6 per cent. below the 1979 level. Manufacturing investment is still more than 10 per cent. less than the 1979 level. The United Kingdom's manufacturing trade deficit is forecast to increase to £4·5 billion in 1986, although we had a substantial surplus in 1980. One would not guess that that was the position from the Chancellor's complacent survey in his Budget speech. There was one glimmer of light in his speech — one faint dawning of comprehension. Referring to the effect on the economy of the fall in the oil price, the Chancellor stated:

"This provides British industry with an outstanding opportunity both to increase its exports and to reduce import penetration in the home market, but it will only be able to seize that opportunity if it meets two conditions. First, it must keep firmer control of its labour costs. Secondly, it must spend more of its much healthier level of profits on investing for the future in research and development and in training. Both the opportunity, and the responsibility to see that it is not thrown away, rest fairly and squarely on the shoulders of British management."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 169.]

First, there was an admonition to industry to keep control of its labour costs. But there was no admonition to the City. There was no feeling that perhaps labour costs in the City were rather high because of the huge salaries that are paid. The "golden helloes" managed to avoid any action by the Government in the Budget. I wonder whether the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster ever says to the stockbrokers, "If you would cut your wages a bit you would create more jobs." On the basis of some of the very large salaries of stockbrokers there must be enormous scope for job creation in the stock exchange.

If the proposition of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is fundamentally true and if one divides a stockbroker's salary by five, there would be five more stockbrokers — or at least that is what the right hon. Gentleman says to the workers.

Mr. Tebbit rose——

Mr. Smith: I am to be given an explanation?

Mr. Tebbit: I say the same to people in the City as I say anywhere else — that if they allow their costs to become higher than those of their competitors they will lose their market share and jobs, their salaries will fall and the "golden helloes" will turn into brass goodbyes. They understand that lesson more clearly than those in other industries.

Mr. Smith: If that is the lesson which they understand, it is amazing that salaries keep going up instead of coming down. If the right hon. Gentleman has been having chats with them, he has been singularly unconvincing and unpersuasive. Everyone knows that salaries in the City and in the stock exchange are hopelessly out of control. It does not help if the Government say to people who are struggling to make ends meet, "You should be careful about asking for wage increases or for improvements in conditions", because they can see the conditions and wages offered to people on high salaries.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that there is no need to test the theory of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster about low wages equalling more jobs, because long ago the Low Pay Unit worked out that the areas where wages are lowest are exactly the areas where unemployment is highest?

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. He is well aware, as are many other hon. Members, of the fundamental principle which seems to motivate the Government — that we need high wages to give incentives to people at the top end of the wage bracket and low wages to give incentives to people at the bottom end of the wage bracket. We have noticed throughout the Budget the attempt to drive more people into low-paid temporary occupations. The drive is not so much to find jobs as to accentuate the prevalence of low pay in the economy. I am sorry to say that a number of the Budget measures are leading in that direction.

The Chancellor has recognised that there should be more investment in research and development and in training, but the trouble is that he thinks it is simply a matter for industrial management. He thinks that the investment rests on their shoulders and implies that it does not rest on anyone else's shoulders. I believe that it is a matter for the whole community because the whole community will be affected by a failure to invest in industry and in research and development and a failure to develop adequate training. If we had employers like those in West Germany, we could perhaps hand over training to them. The West German employers take their responsibilities serously. No one can say that British employers, left to their own devices, have a good record on training. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has an inglorious record, having dismantled 16 of the 23 industrial training boards.

On 12 March 1986, the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet) asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science

"how many of the leading industrial states have progressively increased expenditure on civil research over the past five years; and what is the comparative position of the United Kingdom expressed in real terms."—[Official Report, 12 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 474.]

In an informative answer, the Minister for Information Technology gave some alarming statistics. The increase in gross research and development expenditure from 1979 to 1983—the latest date for which figures were available—was 3 per cent. in the United Kingdom. The increase in the United States was 18 per cent., in Japan 44 per cent., in Germany 10 per cent., in France 10 per cent., in Italy 45 per cent. and in Canada 32 per cent. The United Kingdom is not just bottom of the league but is lamentably bottom of the league, with only a 3 per cent. increase in civil research and development in the past four years from a total budget of $12·6 billion. That is appalling. If Britain continues to invest such a minuscule part of its assets in research and development, it will lose the technological base of its industry and will not be able to develop the new products and processes for tomorrow.

The Government's contribution, through their direct funding of research and development, is pitiful. There is not a research institution or university that is not pleading for more resources for primary research and development. The Government's niggardly attitude is disgraceful. If the Government gave research institutions and universities what they gave in a handout to abolish inter vivos gifts and capital transfer tax, that would be a useful start. Why not give that £55 million to research and development instead of to the rich?

Sir Julian Ridsdale (Harwich): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that the increase in profitability to 8 per cent., compared with 0·3 per cent. in 1979, is a means of getting increased research and development in companies?

Mr. Smith: That would be understandable if companies were doing that now. It was only a matter of days ago that Sir Brian Nicholson, the Government Chief Scientist, in evidence to the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology——

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke): Sir Brian?

Mr. Smith: Yes, as I understand it — the Government's Chief Scientist. He said that the Government were deeply upset at the failure to invest, given the substantial increase in the profits of British companies. I do not think that the Government's excuse will wash. I am given to understand that the Department of Trade and Industry, which is not represented here today, is pressing hard for companies to do that, and so they should.

Why do the Government turn their back on supporting schemes for research and development? Why is there no reference in the Budget to training in industry? Why are there no fiscal incentives, schemes or plans? Why are no ambitions revealed in the Budget? The Government simply have no industrial strategy. They are just moving about the market place, hoping that it will come right. They are not taking any steps, such as those taken by most of our major competitors, to ensure that fundamental aspects such as research and development, training and investment are securely put into place. There is a failure to comprehend that there is more to industry than just giving freedom to the entrepreneur and his wealth. One cannot leave it at that. If the entrepreneur does not invest his wealth wisely, the consequences for the whole of the community are devastating. There may be increased unemployment. There may be diminished opportunity for our young people. There may be a failure to conquer the markets on which the standard of living of us all—not just of the entrepreneur—depends. That is why this is a legitimate matter for community concern.

Today, investment is not being made in new products because we are in the grip of merger mania. When a company that has extra money decides what to do with it, it is far too easy for it to gobble up another company rather than to improve its products and its market share. It may improve its market share but it will do so by eliminating its competitor, because the natural tendency of unregulated markets is towards monopoly. One would have expected even a Conservative Government, recognising that, to adopt a tougher policy on mergers and monopoly, but we do not find that.

Even more lamentably, the present situation in which the creditor can too easily acquire his competition forces industrial managements continually into short-term profits. They must have short-term profits and those profits must be reported to the stock exchange to keep the predator away. When there is a choice between short-term projects—which represent essential defensive security—and long-term investment, long-term investment goes by the board, and the Government look on complacently. The Government have been reviewing competition policy endlessly and continuously for a number of years without doing anything about it. Even the Governor of the Bank of England said the other day that the matter had got out of hand. It is a pity that we do not have a Chancellor of the Exchequer who would say a sensible thing like that.

We need a better investment plan. That is why the Labour party proposes that we should have a national investment bank, which would make sure that long-term investment was secured for British industry. However, when sensible and practical suggestions are put forward, all we hear from right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the Government Benches are silly party political sniggers. The national investment bank would make sure that there was long-term investment at suitable rates of interest. In West Germany, a billion pounds was invested in small and medium-sized businesses by KFB, an admirable bank to which the House of Lords report paid particular attention. Why should not this country have mechanisms to ensure that there is investment in the wealth-creating sectors of the economy? Why cannot the Conservative party have the intelligence to appreciate a good idea when it is presented with one? [Interruption.] One of my hon. Friends suggests that there is not enough of that commodity to go around. There is distressing evidence that that may be so.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): The right hon. and learned Gentleman rightly refers to the manufacturing sector of the economy as the wealth-producing sector. No doubt, like many of us, he reads The Economist. He will have seen there that the wealth-producing sector also embraces the City, about which he has been so disparaging. No doubt he has noticed that the invisible earnings not only contribute to the wealth of this country but contribute a very large number of jobs. In the unlikely event of the right hon. and learned Gentleman returning to power, would he kill the City's earning capacity in his quest for manufacturing industry?

Mr. Smith: I thought that the hon. Gentleman had followed my argument that to depend on the City was not enough. We need to manufacture. The City is rather better at creating jobs in other countries than in our own. The Chancellor boasted about the amount of money that we have invested abroad. He said that we could live like remittance men. He said that there would be a flow of remittances returning from the investments.

The hon. Member for Dorset, South (Viscount Cranborne) is slightly behind the times. He is playing the tune to which I referred earlier—that we can take some chances with manufacturing industry. However, the Government have become a little worried and have changed their stance. It is a pity that the hon. Gentleman has not noticed that. We need to set three engines of recovery in motion. We need a proper investment policy in manufacturing industry, a proper research and development policy and a proper training policy. We are slipping in all three areas.

I must mention one other factor — the near disappearance of regional industrial assistance. I calculate that the Government have more than halved the amount of support for industry that they provide. Hon. Members may recently have seen a very revealing "World in Action" programme on television about some young people from Middlesbrough who went down to High Wycombe to seek work. Although they went by bus, they were following the advice of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to get on their bikes. They went to High Wycombe because they could find no jobs in Middlesbrough. One of them found a reasonably well-paid job fairly quickly, because he had a skill — a skill for which there was no use in Middlesbrough. He was clearly a man who wanted to find work. He was prepared to separate himself from his family to find it. I think that he was paid £120 net in the factory. It cost him £57 to pay for his digs during the week and a visit home every week or fortnight—I forget which—to see his wife and children. He explained that he could not go on like that, with so little left after the £57 had been subtracted, and that he was contemplating returning to Middlesbrough.

Mr. John Townend rose——

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman should listen with a little sympathy and understanding——

Mr. Townend rose——

Mr. Smith: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman. He does not deserve to be given way to. If the public could have seen the look on the hon. Gentleman's face as I was describing the predicament of those people, it would have been a telling political indictment.

Another person from Middlesbrough was told that he could go to High Wycombe too. He came down with his girlfriend; they were contemplating getting married. He too found a job—not so well paid—and his girlfriend found a job in a cafe. They put their wages together and decided to try to set up home in High Wycombe. They went to the estate agents to see whether they could buy a house. They tried every estate agent in High Wycombe, but even the cheapest house cost £10,000 or £15,000 more than they could afford. At the end of the programme, the question was asked: what should they do next? The man who had left his family in Middlesbrough could not take them to High Wycombe because he could not afford to buy a house and there were no council houses available. Should he remain separated from his family and continue to pay so much for lodgings and travel?

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West) rose——

Mr. Smith: Should the other couple live perpetually in digs or furnished lettings in High Wycombe because they could not buy a house? Those people followed the right hon. Gentleman's advice, and that is what happened. Any sensible Government would say, "Why not get the jobs in Middlesbrough, and get to the heart of the problem? Why not spend some of our communal resources helping to create jobs in Middlesbrough?" That is what regional industrial assistance is all about.

That story is revealing about life in modern Britain. There are opportunities, wages and jobs in the south, but very little is available in the north, and the term "north" covers an increasingly wide area of the country. There is a deep divide, which is worrying people in the south as well as the north. Our citizens do not wish to live in a country in which the divisions are becoming so sharp and ugly. A sharp and ugly division is growing between the very well-heeled and the growing under-class, and it is an affront to our conscience.

The Conservatives could give long-term supplementary benefit to the long-term unemployed. They could give about £10 a week to poor unemployed families if they did one simple thing — restored the investment income surcharge which was removed a few Budgets ago. The amount thus saved would more or less meet the cost of long-term supplementary benefit. The investment income surcharge was imposed on investment incomes of over £7,000 a year. People had, by definition, to have £70,000 capital before they benefited from the change. What proper society would give the money available to such people and deny it to the suffering long-term unemployed, the poor families and the needy? In my book, that is not a political choice but a moral one. It is one which the people of this country, when these matters have been made even more clear to them than they have been already, will have no hesitation in answering.

The Budget is both unfair and irrelevant. It is unfair to the divisions between north and south and it is unfair to the divisions between rich and poor. It is supremely irrelevant to putting our manufacturing industry and our economy back on their feet. It is a matter of regret for the whole country that this is happening. It is a matter of shame for this Government.

5.40 pm

Mr. Leon Brittan (Richmond, Yorks): In his speech the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) dealt with a number of wide and important issues which have been with us for a considerable period. I do not agree with his conclusions. However, he has been wise, from his own narrow point of view, not to focus very much upon what the Budget actually says. On the other hand, I welcome the opportunity to join those who have congratulated my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on combining in his Budget a continuing policy of sound finance with the imagination and ingenuity of his proposals.

When I was Home Secretary, naturally I was particularly anxious, as the Minister with responsibility for policy towards the voluntary sector, that the Government should give what help they could to charities. I am delighted that the Chancellor has now been able to give fiscal reality to what were then just a number of embryonic ideas. Equally, I welcome the measures to encourage investment in equities and the proposals to stimulate profit sharing. However, all those measures must be seen in the context of the central Budget decisions on the Government's fiscal and monetary stance.

It is no accident that from the moment when the Government took firm and unpopular action in 1981 to bring the public sector borrowing requirement under control we have seen steady and continuous growth. Therefore, I applaud the Chancellor's decision to continue the downward path of public borrowing as a percentage of gross domestic product and, indeed, to set the public sector borrowing requirement at £7 billion, which is slightly below the level indicated in last year's medium term financial strategy. That is, of course, the key decision in the whole Budget. It is of profound significance that it was that decision, and the Budget constructed around it, that immediately led to a fall in interest rates and the mortgage rate. If one were to ask anyone in industry or business today what single step could be taken which would assist them most in expanding and protecting the jobs of today and providing the jobs of tomorrow, I have no doubt at all that it would be one which would result in a fall in interest rates.

Having taken the central fiscal decisions, the Chancellor had to decide how to distribute the limited amount of largesse that was left to him of about £1 billion. In any Budget there is a certain amount of giving with one hand and taking away with the other—perhaps rather more of that in this Budget than in most—but at the end of the day, on that analysis, there was still only about £1 billion left to play with. That money could, of course, be used to increase spending or to reduce taxes. There are several ways of doing both. All of them are likely to stimulate employment in the short run.

The difference in the extent to which the different measures—increasing expenditure or reducing taxes—would do so is, frankly, not very great. Within the total of only £1 billion, the differences between the impact on jobs of the various possiblities are very small indeed. So there is simply no question of one route being remotely open to the Chancellor as the right one for jobs, while the others are not.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General pointed out, public works programmes today are far from being the best way of getting the most jobs for any given expenditure. The question of the level of public works or capital expenditure more generally in the public sector should be decided on merit, not as a means of short term job creation. In crude terms, if one were thinking that way—and it would be the wrong way to think—the way to create most jobs in the short term is to employ people directly in the public sector or indirectly through the use of public money by such means as special employment measures.

If expenditure of that kind could make a huge difference to the level of employment, it might be tempting to decide to spend the limited sum of £1 billion on that basis. But with that sort of money, it cannot possibly make any substantial difference. Therefore, it would be wrong to decide what to do on such a short term basis. The decision should be made on longer term structural grounds—on the basis of not of what would give the the most immediate boost, which would be dissipated after a short while, but of what would most help to change the structure of the economy in a way that would make it more productive, more innovative, and more likely to grow in a sustained and sustainable way.

It is because reductions in the burden of taxation are likely to have that longer term structural effect that I think the Chancellor was right to spend about £100 million on specific employment measures and the rest on reductions in taxation. The case for tax cuts on those grounds was immensely persuasively made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) earlier in this debate.

The question then arises: what sort of tax cuts should they be? Should they be personal or corporate, direct or indirect? For some time I have believed that the first priority should be to cut personal taxation but to increase allowances over and above indexation to the greatest possible extent That gives most help to those who need it most and takes many of them out of tax altogether. It helps most in the poverty and unemployment traps. But in my view the argument in favour of proceeding in that direction became substantially less strong in the face of the reforms of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. They make a significant difference to the choice between increasing allowances and reducing the basic rate of income tax. Therefore, I became less resolute in my preference for increasing allowances.

That preference was further diminished when I heard the Chancellor announce that at the higher rate he was not indexing thresholds in line with inflation. Indeed, the top rate threshold has been increased by less than half the amount that full indexation would prescribe. In the past, all the thresholds have normally gone up proportionately. The failure to follow that principle this year has not been sufficiently noted. It makes an important difference to the argument and to the impact of the cut in the basic rate of income tax.

I must confess that I was only finally converted to full acceptance that it was right to reduce the rate rather than to increase allowances further when I heard my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury explain last Wednesday that it was the turn this year—I stress "this year"—of those within the income ranges of £5,000 to £20,000 to benefit and, above all, when I heard him say that in choosing to make a reduction in the basic rate this year the Government are not saying that basic reductions are in some sense better than threshold increases. The proper choice between the two will, I assume, have to be reconsidered afresh next year.

However, I am afraid that if the Government's task of persuasion has been effective as far as I am concerned on this point, I have more difficulty with what has been said in the Budget and with what appears in the Red Book about monetary policy. In the very short term, any weakness in monetary policy may be masked by the overall support that is currently rightly being given to the Government's general economic stance, but that should not be a pretext for ignoring what seems to me to be a real problem that is potentially storing up trouble for the future.

The Red Book says that there is some scope for varying the balance between fiscal and monetary policy. I cannot help feeling that fiscal policy is having to do most of the work this year. I find what is said about monetary policy lapidary, tentative and not wholly convincing. That is not entirely the Chancellor's fault. We have simply not found a monetary aggregate that is credible as a target to seek to follow.

To select instead a couple of aggregates and then to say that the exchange rate will also be taken into account, without saying how in any very cogent way, is hardly likely to produce a convincing monetary policy, especially if one of the targets has proved as broken a reed as sterling M3. As recently as in last year's medium-term financial strategy the target range for sterling M3 was set at 4 to 8 per cent., but it has been rightly felt that the failure to meet that target did not mean that monetary policy has been too lax. Other indications show that it was not.

What does one do about sterling M3? The answer given is that sterling M3 does not behave as it used to behave because of the rapid fall in velocity in recent years. Because of that, a new target for 1986-87 has been set at 11 to 15 per cent.—a near trebling of the lower end of the range and a near doubling of the upper end of the range —compared with what was set for this year only 12 months ago.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman seriously maintaining that monetary policy is lax when we have the highest real interest rates in the world by 6 per cent.?

Mr. Brittan: No, I am not. That is exactly what I have said. I am dealing with a problem, which still exists, of how one handles, sets and determines what monetary policy should be. I was going on to say that if one looks at chart 2.3 in the Red Book, which shows the velocity of the monetary aggregates, it is clear that the velocity has been falling fairly steadily since 1980, and there has certainly not been an acceleration of that fall in the last year to justify so huge an increase in the target range. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the target range has been chosen on the basis of what is attainable rather than what has any real significance in terms of the assessment of the appropriate degree of tightness of the monetary policy. That is the answer to the hon. Gentleman.

The lack of real belief in sterling M3 is borne out by two further points. First, the Red Book rather plaintively tells us that "the high proportion of interest bearing deposits within broad money has meant that the immediate response of broad liquidity aggregates to changes in short term interest rates is highly uncertain."

In ordinary language, if sterling M3 looks as if it is going wrong, we have no idea whether our only known instrument of affecting it, now that we have given up overfunding, will put it right.

Secondly, it is significant that no target or illustrative range for sterling M3 is given beyond 1986-87, although figures for GDP and M0 are given for a further three years up to and including 1989-90. The reality is that, with monetary aggregates in disrepute, monetary policy has increasingly been dependent on exchange rates, but the policy has not been clearly spelt out. The difficulty—and I hope to show why it has practical importance—is that, if monetary policy cannot be spelt out convincingly, the markets are uncertain, the authorities may have to react, and the effect is that interest rates are likely to be higher than they would otherwise be and probably change more often.

Excessive interest rates and frequent changes in them are damaging to industry. Therefore, this is not some theoretical or esoteric argument. If credible and comprehensive monetary policy is likely to lead to lower interest rates, that is a valuable prize for which we ought to strive.

I do not believe that there is any monetary target currently in sight that will provide a more worthy lodestar. The way to achieve a convincing monetary policy is through the exchange rate route. Theoretically, it would be possible to choose our own free standing exchange rate target. In my view, it would be artificial to do so, because for so long it has been Government policy to join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system when the time is right. In the past I have not thought that the time was right for that.

Rightly or wrongly, the pound has been regarded as a petro-currency and it was thought that movements in the price of oil would be likely to push the pound in the opposite direction from the currency of the other European countries which are not oil producers. It was said that our entry would be destabilising for the European monetary system and difficult for us to sustain. It is said, and I agree, that there would be nothing worse than frequent realignment and rushing over to Brussels at times of crisis.

Recent events have completely changed that position. At last the world believes what the Treasury has been shouting from the tree tops for years—that the role of oil in our economy is not nearly as great as has been universally assumed. In recent years, there have been at least eight studies of the impact of oil prices on the exchange rate. Taken together they seem to show that a 10 per cent. change in oil prices leads to a 3 to 5 per cent. change in the effective rate. Therefore, a 50 per cent. change in oil prices ought to have been expected to lead to a 15 to 25 per cent. change in the exchange rate. In fact, in recent months the price of oil has fallen by nearly 50 per cent., but the effective exchange rate has fallen by only about 5 per cent. On top of that, the current rate against the deutschmark is competitive for our exporters while the dollar rate is high enough not to be inflationary.

Therefore, I conclude that the moment is approaching very rapidly—if it has not already arrived—when we should fully join the European monetary system. I understand the risks of pressure on the pound on political grounds — for example, impending elections which momentarily seem likely to be won by parties other than the Conservative party. However, the risk of that is no greater inside rather than outside the European monetary system. We would have to take corrective action in any event. In the European monetary system there would still be the retention of freedom of action in genuinely exceptional circumstances.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman taken account of the fact that at present the one dominant currency in the European monetary system is the deutschmark? With the introduction of Britain, there would be two powerful currencies operating on slightly different bases, and that could lead to a certain amount of instability.

Mr. Brittan: That was one of my anxieties. However, for the reason that I have just given, I think that recent developments have removed that anxiety and the advantage of once again having a credible monetary policy would be very great. Such a monetary policy would be a tight one. It would reinforce other pressures on industry not to be lax on the pay front. It is clear that such laxness would not lead to the lowering of the exchange rate to bail out industry in order to restore competitiveness in the short term. Industry would have to play its part in the fight for jobs by resisting excessive pay claims. In that way monetary policy would help the battle against unemployment, as would the lower interest rates which would be likely to come about as a result.

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. Brittan: I hope that my hon. Friend will excuse me, but I am coming to the end of my remarks.

I hope that the hesitancy that I detect in the current statement of monetary policy is caused by the fact that what we are seeing is only a provisional statement and that it will soon be superseded by an approach of the kind that I suggest. I hasten to make it clear that I have no specific reasons for believing that is so. I am expressing a hope. When that happens, the fiscal system and the constructive ingenuity of the Budget which has been so warmly applauded will be complemented by a monetary policy that reinforces the Government's efforts to promote the only kind of economic advance that will endure—an advance that is soundly based and firmly buttressed.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I do not share what appears to be the belief of the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) that if we can find a satisfactory form of monetary measurement we can therefore find the means of manipulating it. As to the advantages of having a fixed exchange rate, I shall arrive at an opposite conclusion from him.

Under the pressure of time, however, I want to restrict myself almost exclusively to one economic phenomenon —the balance of payments. The balance of payments is a very amusing toy to play with. All sorts of arithmetical games can be played with it with great satisfaction and occasionally with some entertainment and instruction. The balance of payments has one delightful quality—that is that it balances, is bound to balance, and always must balance, because it is merely a statement of the different motivations with which the same transactions take place within a given period of time. Hence the astonishing conclusion, which people find difficult to absorb, that if one has a surplus on current account, one must therefore inevitably have an equal and opposite deficit on capital account. That is to say—to put it crudely—one must be exporting capital to the value of whatever is the surplus on the balance of payments in which one happens to be rejoicing.

On the subject of the balance of payments, there are two questions that I want to address specifically, one to the Treasury Front Bench and the other to the Opposition Front Bench. It is, of course, a consequence of having a current surplus on the balance of payments that one is exporting capital; and no doubt a considerable factor in the growth of our overseas assets is due to the surplus which we have enjoyed in our trading accounts of the past six years.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said in his Budget speech:

> "Our net overseas assets have, in fact, risen more than sevenfold from £12 billion at the end of 1979 to almost £90 billion at the end of last year."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 168.]

There is an interesting feature about that statistic. If one totals up our current account surpluses of the past six or seven years, one will not find that they come to anything near the difference between £12 billion and £90 billion. The deduction from this must be that a massive factor in the increase is reinvestment abroad of the profits earned upon overseas investments owned by residents of this country.

The question I want to put to the Opposition Front Bench is this. I understand that it is part of their policy that they will restore control over capital movements. I want to know three things, though essentially they are all part of the same question. First, would they seek to prevent the export of capital from this country? Secondly, would they finish off the job by attempting to secure the repatriation of profits from investments abroad, and thus remove the other factor which was present in the increase to which the Chancellor drew attention? The third but perhaps most important question is this: do the Opposition realise what the effect of that would be upon the balance of payments?

There seems to be the notion that a surplus on our balance of payments is an expendable item, which we are free to invest either in this country or abroad. There is, in fact, no such possibility, for if we do not send that capital abroad we cannot, by definition, have a current surplus on our balance of payments.

Now, although, as I said earlier, the balance of payments is an amusing contraption in an arithmetical sense, in a real sense it is highly complex. We do not really understand the interaction of the various component parts of that balance. Let me take a crude example. We do not know what would be the result of a given increase in exports; do not know whether that would result in an equal increase in our current payments surplus or whether there would be some adjustment in other parts of the account. In particular, we do not know—here I come very much into the real world—how far our experience with the balance of payments has been related to our experience in unemployment.

In Britain today we are meeting with our exports the cost of acquiring all that we find it advantageous to acquire from the outside world, and still are earning a very substantial surplus of payments year in and year out, a surplus that the Chancellor expects to continue. There is a plausible case to be made that that factor — that changeover of the United Kingdom economy from persistent deficit to persistent surplus — may be not unconnected with our difficulty in dealing with the apparently intractable phenomenon of a high statistical level of unemployment, though there are obviously many other factors that also feed into it.

Therefore, it would be right for the Opposition to think — I hope that they can bring the House into their counsels in this matter—about what they intend to do about capital transactions between this country and the outside world. Do they intend to control them, or aim at reducing them to zero? Do they intend to secure the repatriation of the capital that is reinvested abroad? What effect do they think that will have upon the balance of payments, and, through the balance of payments, upon the economy of the country?

Having given the Opposition Front Bench something to think about, I hope, for it is a serious issue, I now refer to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): I have heard the right hon. Gentleman's interesting analysis of the balance of payments many times over the years, but I have never been wholly convinced by it. How, for instance, does he square his analysis with the Japanese experience? For many years the Japanese have combined a large surplus on their balance of payments with full employment at home, but have not always found it necessary to export large quantities of capital. How does the right hon. Gentleman relate that to his analysis?

Mr. Powell: I am sure that the Japanese have found it possible to combine a surplus on their current account with high employment at home. Different economies, at different stages of development and in different circumstances, will differ in that respect. What I cannot believe is that the Japanese have succeeded in achieving in one and the same year a surplus on current account and also a surplus on capital account, which means importing capital at the same time. In fact, they have been buying assets abroad—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Hon. Members are with me on that—and that is what has been enabling the Japanese to maintain their continuing large surplus on current account, which appears, although unaccountably to me, to cause so much anxiety.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Has the right hon. Gentleman taken into account the possibility of industrialisation leading to an increase in the £74 billion of imports that we bring into the country? That could be raw materials, capital goods and such things. Only a 5 per cent. increase would wipe out our balance of payments surplus.

Mr. Powell: I follow the right hon. Gentleman entirely in that I do not think that it is easy to quantify or predict the result of changing a given factor in the balance of payments analysis. Some of the factors which, in themselves, are inherently negative may turn out, in their repercussions and indirect effects, to be positive overall. To that extent, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman.

I now come to the point that I wish to put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He said that British industry has the "opportunity both to increase its exports and to reduce import penetration in the home market."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 169.]

I want to ask him what he thinks the consequences will be if that exhortation, hope or prayer on his part is followed by British industry.

In so far as exports are increased and import penetration in the home market is reduced, no doubt the current account surplus on our overall balance of payments will, other things being equal, be that much greater — we shall have an intensification of the phenomenon which we have experienced in the past six years. Is that what the Chancellor aims at? Is that what he hopes for? What is his analysis of the economic consequences — the consequences in terms, first, of the impact on the balance of payments, and, secondly, the impact upon the economy of that impact on the balance of payments?

I come in haste to the matter with which the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks was dealing — control of the exchange rate. The balance of payments will operate inexorably, whether or not one messes around with the exchange rate. With an exchange rate entirely free to move, with which the Bank of England is not playing any games, still the inexorable logic of the balance of payments will apply. But if one decides upon a fixed exchange rate policy—or an aligned exchange rate, which is effectively another version of the same thing —then, in addition to everything else, one is deciding to add a further factor, namely, the level of the exchange rate, and bring that into the play of forces which determine the composition of the balance of payments.

If one decides to fix the exchange rate, one does so at one's own expense, in two ways: to keep the rate down one manufactures one's own currency and sells it; to push the rate up one borrows other people's currencies and sells that. It is a simple and rather hair-raising game, is rigging the exchange rate. In the end the cost always recoils on the country which does it—either by the consequences of providing currency of its own in order to depress the rate, or by the consequences of the international debt incurred in operations to force the exchange rate up.

The Prime Minister made a sage observation — indeed, it might have been a deep observation—when, responding to a supplementary of mine, she said, referring to the suggestion that we should tie our exchange rate to a norm not within our own control, that had the Government listened to the suggestions earlier

"we would have found ourselves in some difficulty in view of the fluctuation in exchange rates which inevitably comes through having a currency rather different from those in the rest of Europe."—[Official Report, 6 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 444.]

The right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks evidently believes that we have walked out of history. He believes that we have left behind us the period when factors which none of us foresaw, not years before, but only a few weeks before, could alter the balance of supply and demand for sterling. For myself, I cannot believe that the change in economic variables throughout the world which comes home to roost in terms of a movement of the sterling exchange rate lies behind us once and for all and that therefore it would now be painless to attach ourselves to an external norm. I believe that we would still find ourselves paying dearly to maintain that norm, and ultimately at our own cost.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman is under an illusion when he imagines that the stop-go that would result would be an effective measure against inflation. It is true that it has been used in terrorem by Chancellors of the Exchequer. They threatened the economy, which they were themselves inflating, that if it did not behave itself, there would be a balance of payments crisis; but still inflation continued and still the balance of payments crisis had to be met by sudden and sharp adjustments of the rate of exchange.

I agree rather with the right hon. and learned Gentleman's fundamental proposition that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and this Adminstration in general have, by control of public sector borrowing, been utilising the only instrument by which money supply can be increased or controlled or by which inflation can be—to use the rather absurd metaphor—conquered. We would not get any nearer to that by applying the self-punishing mechanism of an externally fixed exchange rate, which would have to be fed in along with all the other factors in the balance of payments.

So I hope that the Government will reflect long and hard upon the philosophy of the Prime Minister's reply, and that we shall continue to enjoy what have proved to be the lasting advantages of an exchange rate which tells us the truth about the worldwide supply and demand for our currency. At least we can do without that additional factor in the already difficult and puzzling make-up of the balance of payments about which both from the Chancellor of the Exchequer and eventually, no doubt after an appropriate period of reflection, from Her Majesty's Opposition I look forward to further enlightenment.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) asked the Opposition Front Bench about the repatriation of capital. British pension funds have already been threatened that unless they repatriate some of their capital invested abroad the fiscal advantage will be withdrawn from them. The Opposition policy is clear.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned Japan. He did not mention an additional advantage enjoyed by Japan over many years—its small defence budget. It competes with other economies with defence expenditures amounting to an appreciable amount of GDP.

I think that the Budget is clever and far-sighted. It is not a Budget just for tomorrow. The Chancellor has little room for manoeuvre. He has said that the oil factor in our economy is merely 5 per cent. and that the buoyancy of the other 95 per cent. is real. That is borne out in the figures and the Treasury receipts in January which were about £4·5 billion against a forecast of about £2 billion.

The buoyancy in the economy was too conservatively projected in the Budget last year. As a consequence, the Chancellor had some flexibility, albeit only about £1 billion. He has relieved taxation by that amount. That confounds the doom and gloom prophets. I know that Opposition Members think that this is old hat, but productivity, even in manufacturing, is increasing. Growth in the past five or six years has been sustained. Output, productivity and investment in manufacturing are increasing.

[Sir William Clark]

We should stop talking down the economy. Our economy is extremely buoyant. Ours is not a petro-currency. Opposition Members do the country a disservice in always talking down our economy.

We are accused of wasting oil revenues. Over the years we have received about £50 billion in oil revenues, but, as the right hon. Member for South Down reminded us, our overseas assets have increased by about £78 billion, from £12 billion to £90 billion. That must be good for the future, whether we invest in dividends or whatever. Opposition Members do not realise that if one invests abroad one can look forward to the dividend, but that in many cases the only way to penetrate the overseas market is to acquire subsidiaries. That has certainly happened in America and in Europe. When people question capital going out of the country they must realise that many other countries such as America and Japan invest here. If we become isolationist and decide not to invest abroad, we shall suffer reciprocity.

We should not forget the background to the Budget. Inflation is coming down. People can plan with far more certainty. Inflation was 26 per cent, today it is just over 5 per cent., and it is bound to come down to about 3 or 3·5 per cent. Any increase in employment will be retarded by high wage demands. I hope that industry realises that.

At one time the CBI appeared to be concerned only with the need to reduce interest rates. The one point drop that we have recently enjoyed is excellent and it will give industry a boost of about £250 million, but a one point drop in wage rates would give industry a boost of £1,000 million. That is how we shall secure more research and development and more jobs, and that is why it is essential to keep down wage demands.

I am sure that everyone welcomes the measures in the Budget to improve training. In addition, we have the loan guarantee scheme, the business expansion scheme and the community programme.

I welcome the suggestion that wages should be tied to profitability. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster drew attention to the fact that the long-term unemployed are being interviewed over three, four or five days with a view to their joining or forming job clubs. A few pilot schemes throughout the country have been successful and I understand from my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment that they are to be extended generally. It is interesting to note that there has been some deregistering by the unemployed in some areas where clubs have been formed or introduced.

There are 3·2 million who are unemployed and that is disastrous. I hope that the House will not think that I am trying to denigrate the importance that is attached to reducing unemployment. However, we should ascertain how many of the 3·2 million are looking actively for work. We all know that some have taken early retirement and are not looking for work but are registered as unemployed. Some married women who were in employment are registered as unemployed but are not looking actively for work. If we have 3·2 million drawing benefit, I accept that unemployment is far too high—we must ascertain how many are looking actively for work.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): The hon. Gentleman talks about inflation being reduced, but he has not said that unemployment is increasing massively. It is useless to talk to the unemployed, who expect unemployment to increase, as though everything in the garden is glorious and that nothing is wrong. Is it not a fact that the unemployed have been taken out of a sector where they were able to buy products and that if they returned to it they would be able to buy more products? The spiral of unemployment makes things worse all the time. I ask the hon. Gentleman to accept that reality.

Sir William Clark: I cannot understand the hon. Gentleman's logic.

Mr. Flannery: Of course the hon. Gentleman cannot.

Sir William Clark: I should have said that I cannot understand the logicality of the hon. Gentleman's statement. Surely the reduction of inflation is the greatest boon to everyone, whether he or she is on a small income or a large one. It must be better for inflation to decrease rather than increase. Surely that is obvious to anyone.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us in his Budget statement that the surplus assets in pension funds will be taxed at 40 per cent. I do not object to that, but I am slightly concerned that the Government Actuary will intervene if the assets of a pension fund are only 5 per cent. more than the fund's liabilities. I am not certain that a surplus of 5 per cent. is a sufficiently high one for the introduction of taxation. I do not agree that the pension funds should hold massive surpluses, but we must not undermine the integrity or the financial stability of occupational pension funds. If the stock market turns down and securities decline, some of the pension funds with a 5 per cent. surplus may be in trouble.

The 11 million occupational pensioners should be aware of what the Opposition have in store for them. As I understand it, a Labour Government would force the institutions—the pension funds—to invest in a national investment bank. The House will recall that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) talked about a national investment bank and investment, but he did not say from where its funds would come. I believe that a good part of the funds will be forced from occupational pension schemes. I have no objection to forced investment if I am satisfied that the person who is to invest my money will do so wisely, but unfortunately the record of most public investment is not all that good. If the funds of the 11 million are to be diverted into a national investment bank and reinvested—no doubt into lame ducks to create jobs, for example—pensioners and their pensions will be put at risk.

The Opposition have threatened that if a Labour Government are returned they will repurchase all the shares that have been bought under our privatisation measures. Of course, a Labour Government would not repurchase the shares that have been bought by small investors. We know that 2 million small investors bought British Telecom shares and we know also that a Labour Government would not wish to upset them. Presumably a Labour Government would repurchase the shares that have been bought by the institutions. Apparently, they will buy them at the same price that the institutions paid for them initially. No allowance will be made for inflation between purchase and repurchase. Similarly, there will be no allowance for any capital growth that has taken place between purchase and repurchase. Again, this will put at risk the pensions of the 11 million occupational pensioners.

I say to occupational pensioners that they should beware of any Labour Government. I have explained what the Opposition intend to do with their money and their future.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer knows that I am in slight disagreement with him on how we should relieve the burden of taxation. The reduction of the standard rate of tax by 1p, from 30p to 29p, was excellent, and the same can be said of the indexation of the tax thresholds. However, under the new indexation, a married man will start paying tax as soon as he has earned £70 a week. Surely that figure is far too low when the national average wage is slightly more than £180 a week. A priority for any Chancellor of the Exchequer should be to increase thresholds so that half the national average wage becomes the tax threshold for a married man. When that has been achieved, let us deal with the standard rate tax.

The Budget is a continuation of previous measures in that it encourages wider share ownership and the Government's housing policy, which has led to more than 60 per cent. of houses being owner-occupied. There are over 4 million small shareholders, and that number will increase with the introduction of PEP, which I warmly welcome. More help will be given to charities and some of the strain will be taken from the public purse in looking after people through the various charities.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be congratulated on the Budget. The exchange rate has been abolished and so has the investment surcharge, along with the tax on jobs which was imposed by the Labour Government in the form of the national insurance surcharge. Development land tax has been abolished and it is time that my right hon. Friend abolished the lifetime gifts tax. As others have said, it is an ingenious Budget. It is also a prudent Budget and it will be welcomed by most of the British people. Furthermore, it is a cautious Budget. I am sure that all my right hon. and hon. Friends look forward to next year's Budget.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): I am sure that many hon. Members would agree with the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) that one of the better aspects of the Budget concerned the changes for charities. I welcome those changes, and I am not afraid to say that. However, I take issue with the hon. Member for Croydon, South when he implies that charities could substantially help to alleviate some of the enormous social problems in our country. Charities can set standards, have new ideas and manoeuvre a fresh approach to many issues, but, relative to the global problem regarding the relief that they bring for the many people who need help, their contribution can never be that massive. However, I am willing to agree, enthusiastically, that we should encourage individuals to give money to the charity of their choice and to do that through fiscal measures.

The first major point that I should like to make has already been mentioned—the problem that the economy is currently experiencing regarding unit labour costs. The Chancellor identified that problem during his Budget statement, the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) at least managed to make passing reference to it, and the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) made substantial reference to that problem and concluded that we should join the EMS.

I have long taken the view—a view held by the alliance—that we should join the EMS, but those who believe that that will solve unit labour cost problems in splendid and wonderful isolation are misled. It is time that the House applied itself more to the problem of unit labour costs than it has done hitherto. In 1979 we were told that the solution was simple—we should control the money supply. There are few in the House now, even among its original, enthusiastic advocates, who would argue for that idea.

At Budget time it is fair to ask the Government, if they see unit labour costs as one of the great problems affecting the economy—and I would concur with that belief—and if they believed originally that control of the money supply was the solution, to tell us what went wrong with the original policy or what they wish to put in its place. The alliance firmly believes that, unless we can get unit labour costs under reasonable control relative to our competitors, there is no prospect of long-term economic recovery. I am not certain that many in the Treasury would disagree with that diagnosis.

It is interesting to analyse the experience of the average British industrial worker compared with that of the average German industrial worker over the past 20 years. I have been trying to find the precise answer to the following question but have not been successful, although I can give an approximate answer: which group of workers, German industrial or British industrial has, in each year received the largest pay increase? The answer would appear to be something like 16 : 4 or maybe 15 : 5 in favour of the British worker. It is certain that in most of the past 20 years the German industrial worker has received a substantially smaller increase in the monetary value of his pay than his British counterpart. Yet, when one analyses the changes in living standards that have taken place over that time, it shows how lunatic and nonsensical is the obsession with an individual's yearly pay increase.

We must undertake a major propaganda effort to explain that point and make it more widely known. Indeed, as I sit on the alliance Benches and listen to some of the comments from the Labour Benches, it is apparent that we must do a great deal of work on that matter in the House. If we cannot get industrial pay settlements down to a little over the level of inflation, there is no alternative economic scenario which will get people back to work and rebuild our manufacturing base, for which so many people in this House desperately wish.

The Government have occasionally applied their mind to wages. However, they have taken on the easy targets —the ones that least needed attention. There has been much legislation to reduce the pay of the very lowest paid in Britain. The people creating difficulty in that area are not the ones who immediately flash to mind. The Government have put a lot of effort into taking on an easy target because they wish to duck a far more difficult one. It is not the low paid who are causing the problems; rather it is us—and I use the word "us" in a collective sense to describe those of us in the medium to well paid category. We must somehow persuade people in that category to accept pay rises of rather less than they have been getting over the years if we wish to re-establish our employment record and manufacturing base.

[Mr. David Penhaligon]

Even more than that—although this is not absolutely fundamental to the Budget statement, there is an implication for it — we have seen the Government's determined and successful attempt to keep down many of the pay settlements in what I describe in the broadest sense as the Government sector. That is causing a potential explosion of resentment which is gradually building up beneath the Government. It is an explosion of demand and a feeling of outrage which I suspect someone at some time will have to pay for.

Much of the Government's progress on inflation is undoubtedly true and real, and the alliance welcomes that, but much is illusory and not necessarily long-term. It is worth pointing out, when the figures comparing this decade with the last decade are so freely given across the Floor of the House, that at this moment, after all the agony that this country has been through, as far as I am aware, there is only one industrially-based nation which can reasonably be compared to Britain. Only Italy has a higher level of inflation than Great Britain. Italy has an inflation rate two or three points higher than ours. All the other nations have lower inflation levels—not much lower, it is true, but it is worth stressing that. Despite the effort, sacrifices and enormous level of unemployment, so far as I am aware, only one country has a higher level of inflation than ours.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Would the hon. Gentleman care to consider Greece, Portugal and Spain, just to mention three other countries, when he makes those statements?

Mr. Penhaligon: I did say that I was comparing nations roughly equivalent to ourselves. I did not realise that the Government believe that the British economy is now in such a state that we should compare ourselves with Portugal, Spain and Greece. If that is the standard adopted by the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), so be it. However, when comparing ourselves with France, Germany, Holland, Canada, the United States and nearly all the OECD countries with a large manufacturing base, my previous statement is true. If I need to be corrected, there will be opportunities for that to be done.

The alliance's conclusion—which is not popular and may not attract votes but which is important and fundamental and one which we will argue for with vigour — is that there must be some kind of incomes policy within the economy. That policy should preferably be built on the back of consent; if not, on the back of a mandate. In the final analysis, it should be encouraged to work through statutory fiscal pressures.

My next point concerns the penny off income tax. It has been interesting listening to hon. Members speaking about that. In reality, the Chancellor, having adjusted this and that, discovered that he had about £1 billion to spend. That is his judgment. The alliance took another view in the alternative submission that we put to the House, which was published before the Budget and which we were willing to put through the various economic models. That was a brave and unusual thing for an Opposition party to do. It is certainly something that the Labour Front Bench would not dare to do as the computer is likely to say "submit" or "surrender" before it gets through the first six months of the Labour party's proposals. However, we are willing to put our alternative submission to the test. We believe that we could run a slightly bigger PSBR. I do not wish to discuss that point at present. I should just like to accept the Chancellor's analysis of his £1 billion to spend. One can run a PSBR bigger than that, but let us simply accept the Chancellor's statement about that £1 billion.

In current circumstances, on what would the House collectively wish to spend that £1 billion? That is the decision that the Chancellor had to make. The alliance, in its submission, said that it thought that one of the most effective ways of using that money would be to relieve poverty, create jobs and give the manufacturing base some kind of boost. To do that the money could be used to reduce the employers' national insurance contributions. We accept that there are alternatives. One could have argued that some of the money should go to alleviate the poverty that has undoubtedly increased in our society over the past few years, particularly among the unemployed and the retired. One could have argued that some of the money should be used to build up and repair the infrastructure — houses, roads, sewers or whatever. The alliance argued for a combination of the three in its submission.

The Government decided not to do any of those things. They decided that poverty, jobs and the infrastructure were not important. They chose to spend that miserable £1 billion in the least effective way. They decided to reduce income tax by 1p in the pound rather than to rebuild our industry and infrastructure and relieve poverty.

We know from knocking on doors during election campaigns that few constituents would offer to pay more tax. I am constantly amazed when politicians argue to the contrary. But we believe that the 1p in the pound off income tax is a mistake, and to show that we take that seriously we shall seek to divide the House on that matter tonight. We shall vote against that reduction in income tax tonight because we believe that there are other less selfish ways in which that money could be used.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): This is obviously an important issue for the hon. Gentleman's party. Why was not income tax mentioned in the budgetary statement, "Jobs and competitiveness," which his party issued in advance of the Budget?

Mr. Penhaligon: Income tax is mentioned. We said —the Minister will be unfair not to recognise this—that we would valorise tax thresholds and tax levels. If the Minister does not know what that means, he has not read far enough. We made it clear that we would increase thresholds in line with inflation, but—and we were not trying to duck it, deny it or wriggle our way out of it—that we must face the economic reality. We would not have reduced income tax by 1p in the pound in the current situation.

We would not have exempted lifetime gifts from tax altogether. It is an obscenity beyond belief that, as a result of the budget, a parent during his lifetime can give a child £10 million and that massive transfer of wealth would not incur one farthing of tax. Previously, the Chancellor would have taken £3 million.

Politically, the Government will get away with that change because most people do not believe that there are people who have £10 million to give to their children. But those who have been Members of the House for a year or two know jolly well that there are many hon. Members who could afford that. With all the poverty and housing problems that we see, it is staggering that, of all the people the Treasury could relieve, it has chosen to relieve people with that sort of wealth. We on this Bench do not argue, and never have, that levels of tax should be such that they represent confiscation. The previous level was one third. Plus or minus a bit, that is about right. Frankly, in all decency, someone who has £10 million to give to a child can afford £3 million in tax.

Mr. John Townend: Does not the hon. Gentleman have the problem in his constituency that many other hon. Members have of family businesses being forced to sell out because of capital transfer tax, with the consequent loss of jobs? Does he accept that some of the family businesses that went out of business or sold up in the 1960s and 1970s would have been the seedcorn that would have provided jobs today? Will he at least exempt family businesses?

Mr. Penhaligon: We have not attacked some of the changes in capital transfer tax.

If one takes £10 million——

Sir William Clark: I did not mention £10 million.

Mr. Penhaligon: I know. I am talking about the consequence of the Government's legislation. Farms are the most difficult area in relation to capital transfer tax in areas such as mine. They already have a 50 per cent. exemption on top of the basic rate. A farmer must own a grand-daddy of a farm for it to be worth £10 million, even with the inflated property values that we have today.

Mr. John Townend: £500,000.

Mr. Penhaligon: Oddly enough, one could argue that capital transfer tax started at too low a level at £71,000. That is where it started previously. I have not mentioned the £71,000 level, but I become extremely angry at the net effect of the removal of capital transfer tax from a sum of £10 million.

The lunacy of the Government's position is that the only wealth we now tax is that which is released from its possessor as a result of his unexpected death. No other wealth is taxed. Everybody knows that they will die in the end, and there is plenty of advice that people can take on that. The only people who will pay large-scale capital transfer tax in future are those who die unexpectedly, or, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) said, those who trust the Inland Revenue more than they trust their own relatives.

Mr. Moore: I apologise for intervening again, but it is interesting to learn the policies of the hon. Gentleman's party. How does the hon. Gentleman combine what he has been saying at great length about capital transfer tax—I trust that he will seek the opportunity to vote against this Budget resolution in order to put his party's position on the record—with the fact that in the past seven years, since 1978-79, the proportion of taxation taken in capital taxation has increased from 1·4 per cent. to 1·8 per cent. and in real terms the revenue yield has gone up by 30 per cent?

Mr. Penhaligon: The right hon. Gentleman will certainly reduce that this time. I rather suspect that a fair amount of capital has been transferred in the past few years in the belief that the regime could not conceivably become more favourable. It just shows what mistakes people can make. If only they had hung on a bit longer, they would have paid no tax at all.

The Chancellor is clearly in a difficult financial position. He lost £5 billion from oil and he takes no blame for that. But the Government must be able to stand up and defend why, within the narrow limits for manouevre that they have in this Budget, they have decided to use £1 billion in the way that they have.

Many Conservative Back Benchers, at least on television, attack that change with as much vigour as I do. If there were a secret vote on this among Government Back Benchers, the 1p in the pound reduction in income tax would not receive a majority.

Mr. Michael Heseltine (Henley): I share the broad approval that has been extended, not only in the House but widely outside, for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Budget statement which has achieved so many of his central economic aims. Obviously, the Government's prime responsibility to secure control over the economy is self-evident. There is no question whatever that on some of the more important aspects of my right hon. Friend's policy he had a good story to tell. The star of the record was the fact that we now look to the prospect of a 3·5 per cent. rate of inflation. Not even the most enthusiastic Government supporters believed that we would reach such levels as quickly as we have. Without the slightest doubt, falling interest rates and rising output and productivity in an economy that is now growing faster than any comparable economy, with the possible exception of that of Japan, are a remarkable achievement.

We should not lose sight of the fact that part of the growth in output, particularly in manufacturing, is a recovery from a low base but that is now rising and it is part of a growing economy on a consistent year-on-year basis. That is a solid and real achievement. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was right to draw the attention of the House to the fact that much of the credit for our falling inflation goes to the falling levels of raw materials and changing oil prices, but there is a countervailing force which is much to be deplored. The private sector has been given the most incentive-oriented economy that it ever dreamt it would see, but we are speeding up the potential level of inflation with wage settlements running at nearly double the level of inflation. We shall pay the price for that in lost jobs and lost opportunities as it feeds through into the economy.

Recently, we have benefited considerably from the change in the price of imports and of oil but the private sector is undermining benefits which should accrue to the whole national economy. That is to be deplored.

I agree with the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) that the Government have taken an immensely courageous stand in holding down public sector wage claims for a long time. There is an unhappy contrast between how the public sector has accepted that, with great difficulty and with great stress to the Government, and what is happening in parts of the private sector. Everybody knows that significant real increases in earnings are being achieved by many of those who are in work because pay settlements are so far above the level of inflation. Everybody expected that the steps that the Chancellor would take would lead to a fall in interest rates, but it did not seem self-evident to me that we should further encourage an increase in real living standards for those people by giving them a 1p reduction in the standard rate of income tax.

I was slightly at odds with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—although I agree with much of what he said—because he did not give quite the right emphasis to the sale of capital assets to finance current consumption increases which a standard rate reduction in tax would tend to stimulate. There is too little awareness that the capacity to go on selling assets is temporary. If one stimulates consumption on the basis of capital asset realisation, one is losing sight of the long-term need to use those capital asset realisations for capital growth and capital stimulation as opposed to enhanced consumption, which we might find difficult to sustain when the ability to realise more capital assets is diminished.

I strongly commend the Chancellor and his predecessor, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, for their consistent efforts to incentivise and stimulate the small business economy. It is impossible to underestimate the scale of present incentives to encourage people to become self-employed, to start their own businesses and to develop those businesses into successful, thriving concerns.

If there is a criticism of previous Governments — there are many, especially of the Labour Government— it is that there was a relatively inflexible economy for far too long. We were not sufficiently innovative and, when the recession came, there was not the wide dispersal of industry and activity which might have protected us from some of the worst excesses of that recession. Recently, however—and this Budget continues the policy—we have created a wide range of incentives which are equal to anything that can be offered anywhere in the world.

I strongly support the Chancellor's determination to build on the philosophical and political strength on which the Government have laid such importance — the spreading of ownership. The property-owning democracy of the 1950s and 1960s, to which the Government have added the enfranchisement of council tenants, has played as decisive a role in changing fundamental attitudes to individual responsibilities as any other single feature of modern society. To extend that into wider share ownership must be the priority. Without the slightest doubt, the Chancellor has taken an important step. I hope that he will accept that it is not the last one. There are other incentives, which could easily be copied from overseas, to give greater thrust to our economy. However, all credit is due to my right hon. Friend for taking that important step in the Budget.

I take issue with the hon. Member for Truro on his attempt to win both ways on the taxation of small family businesses. We quite understand that the principal Opposition party, in its guts, has no sympathy or empathy for the flourishing private sector economy and the private businesses that it creates. It has for generations encouraged the incentivisation that encourages publicly quoted companies to buy up family businesses and thus diminish the provincial power base of the industrial heartlands of Britain.

The tax changes announced by the Chancellor mean that those who create businesses will be able to pass them on to their families or to sell them within the community to which they are important. That is an important part of maintaining the capitalist strength of Britain. Nothing is more harmful, other than nationalisation in which so many Opposition Members believe, than forcing, by considerable fiscal incentives and high capital taxes, family business, to sell out to publicly quoted companies. That is another step towards the centralisation of wealth. The branch officer takes the place of the entrepreneur in provincial Britain. The Chancellor has taken a courageous step in trying to reverse that trend. The Labour party has no interest in encouraging such a thriving capitalist base.

The Liberal party says that it favours a capitalist base for small people, but the moment a company becomes successful it will obliterate the company's ability to remain in business. That is a classic example of the Liberal party not being prepared to stand up for either side of the political argument. If one genuinely wants capitalism and for it to be a rival to the centralising process of Socialism, one must recognise that small businesses will, in many cases, become large. It is far better to leave the ownership of those businesses where they were created and where they are relied on than to centralise them by taxation or other techniques.

From the privacy of Government discussions, the Chancellor is as familiar with my views as I am. If I have one criticism of his Budget it is that it has a discretion which I would rather see used differently. I am aware of the limited opportunities available to the Chancellor, but I would have preferred him to have encouraged more direct investment in and stimulation of the underlying strengths of the manufacturing base. I do not intend to expand on that today. I accept that he was faced with limited opportunities, but he should have taken a more purposeful stride forward towards the stress areas associated with inner city deprivation.

I do not intend to take the time of the House describing the conditions which are now characteristic of inner city Britain and comparing them with the more prosperous suburbs, rural areas and, especially, the south. I am the first to say that in every constituency—even in mine, which is relatively prosperous—there are pockets of poverty and individual cases of tragedy. Those of us who represent the more prosperous parts of Britain cannot honestly say that there is not an unacceptable gap between what we see in the stress areas of the inner cities and the prosperous parts of Britain. That is recognised in the harsh conditions of the inner city stress areas and throughout the British political community.

We do not need an endless parade of more statistics because the conditions in those areas have an eloquence of their own. The Government, as everyone is aware, inherited rapidly rising unemployment from the last Labour Government. It is extraordinary to listen to the Opposition Front Bench. If it is so easy to deal with the problems of unemployment, why did the Labour Government of the late 1970s find it impossible to reverse the then upward trend? The Government inherited about 1 million unemployed, which was a post-war record. The Labour Government had no idea how to reverse or grapple with the unemployment which was permeating through the entire Western world. If Labour does not recognise that basic part of its inheritance, it will never command the respect of the country.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): This is not Blackpool.

Mr. Heseltine: People remember that there were no easy solutions when Labour Members sat on the Treasury Bench. There are no easy solutions today, and there certainly would be none if, by misjudgment, Labour party Members found themselves back on the Treasury Bench.

We should be frank. Although unemployment is unacceptably high, its level has never been seen to be capable of being cured easily or simply by changing the political party in power. The social, fiscal and economic forces of the 20th century have encouraged generations with wealth and discretion to leave the inner cities. They left behind conditions which are increasingly reminiscent of state-dependent pensioner societies. These are the people who have too few personal resources. They tend to be less well educated, elderly and to have no family support. They are the last group in society to whom we can apply the language of self-reliance and a competitive race in which, by their own abilities, they should somehow succeed. They do not have the personal characteristics with which they can fairly be expected to survive in that rather over-simplistic description of life's forces.

The language of self-help when applied to those communities is something of a delusion. There is growing anxiety about the social imbalances and the consequences that flow from them. Those anxieties grew under the previous Government, as under the present one. When the Government came to power, they rightly refused to increase, or even in some cases to sustain, all of the programmes which affected some of those areas. There was absolutely no case for excluding current programmes of local government from the rigours to which the private sector was being subjected by the recession. Nor was there any reason to exclude local government from the appraisals and the insistence upon greater efficiency to which the Government subjected the national Civil Service. There was no case for setting the bureaucracies of local government apart from that long overdue scrutiny of our national performance. If anybody has the slightest doubt about that, he has only to pick up the latest report of the local government Audit Commission to discover that the figures prove that service after service can be provided at a perfectly acceptable level but at significantly lower cost.

There was absolutely no case for suggesting that restrictive practices and over-manning in inner cities should be set apart from the pressures to which British society was subjected. If there is a point to be made on that score, it is that restrictive practices so close to conditions of harshness were even more culpable because they denied resources to those who needed them most.

The Government experimented across a wide range of policy areas. In their experiments with specific urban programmes, the Government, despite the constraints on public expenditure, substantially increased expenditure in real terms on programmes dealing with the worst hardship.

There were two simple objectives. The first was to try to do something to alleviate the conditions of those who had been left behind in stress areas. That does not add up to a whole policy, however; it merely accepts the inevitability of the historic forces that brought such decline about.

The second and essential objective, which the Government developed as policy, was to try to attract back into the stress areas people who would otherwise remain outside. To widen the basis of society in stress areas, we had to try to attract private investment which would have gone—some still is going—to the suburbs, the green-field sites, and the congested south. We recognised that, to bring a new sense of hope and purpose to stress areas, we had to make them attractive. In a free society, we had to encourage people or to produce incentives to enable people to find a way back — people and investment which would not have chosen to go to those areas otherwise, under any Government.

I shall not list the vast range of grants, programmes and experiments that we conducted, but far and away the most significant and successful is to be found in the east end of London. Through the Urban Development Corporation, we have set about rebuilding the east end of London. It is without doubt one of the most exciting pieces of inner city reclamation in western Europe. Some people talk of the clear divide between the public and the private sector, but I am told that for every £1 of public money going to the east end of London through the UDC, £7 of private money is taking advantage of the opportunity which the public purse created. I saw in The Times on Friday a supplement about the north-west of Britain which refers to a land being born again. Virtually every scheme that is referred to in the supplement was born because the Government took public money into the inner cities to create the environment in which larger sums of private money could be attracted. The Government have shown that the public sector can lead and that, where it leads, the private sector will follow, even into the most deprived and needful areas of the country.

My conclusion is therefore clear. We now know what to do and how to do it. It is clear that, to attract back the strengths that have gone during several decades, we must recognise that there is no substitute for the public leadership which clears the dereliction of the Victorian, the Edwardian and, in some cases, the post-war world. No private sector initiative will do it on its own, because this is a loss-making business. There is no profit to be found. Any of us who is asked to advise the private sector whether it should lose money in such endeavours is bound to advise it not to. We must therefore ask whether we leave these vicious circles of despair to continue on their downward journey or whether we will find the resources to clear the dereliction of the past and to make the areas attractive so that, combining public and private endeavour, we can give people there, and the new ones we can attract, a sense of hope and purpose.

It is said that we cannot throw money at these problems. Just what will we throw at them if it is not money? What else will be used to clear up the dereliction? What else will get rid of the appalling squalor in inner cities? I do not mean that we should spend money indiscriminately, but we have now been experimenting for the whole of the decade. If we have learnt nothing, we should be ashamed of ourselves. I believe, however, that we have learnt the answers that we sought. Once we have the answers, it is our responsibility, if the matter is accorded priority, to extend the experiments commensurate to the scale of the problem. It is only the careful balance between the public and the private sectors which can lead us forward as the appalling conditions demand.

In his Budget statement, my right hon. Friend answered the final question which he would be entitled to put to me —where is the money to come from? He reduced the public sector borrowing requirement by £500 million. I do not believe that there was any case for doing that. We have already pursued with great courage a harsh regime to bring the economy back to a condition of which we can be proud and in which it is growing and there is wealth for dispersal.

[Mr. Heseltine]

Even in the discussions and forecasts of the present Government, it has never been considered necessary to reduce the PSBR by another £500 million. Indeed, I believe that we could have increased the PSBR by £500 million and there would have been no difference in the acclaim with which my right hon. Friend's Budget was greeted.

Even if my right hon. Friend insisted on reducing the PSBR by £500 million, and did not accept that it could have been increased, he still had £1 billion. It therefore becomes a matter of balance. We know what to do. The judgment is about priorities. We can stimulate jobs and wealth and recognise the social imbalance that the tensions that I have described have created by leading the private sector—the builders, the investors, the strong, and the able—back into areas of deprivation.

We have to create an urban environment which attracts people to live and invest in it. The chance to stride forward with conviction this year has sadly been missed, but there will be another. It is the privilege of Chancellors that, after one week's recuperation, they begin on the public expenditure round as a prelude to next year's Budget. The process is circular and remorseless and it has familiar characteristics about it.

I hope that my right hon. Friends not represented in the debate today, who would not be the Chancellor's natural allies but who represent the policies that are of central importance in giving new life to the inner city areas, will recognise that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is perceived as having a wider discretion in his hands next year. I hope that, as the public expenditure round that is the prelude to next year's Budget gets under way, all those harrowing stories of how we are not going to make it this time and how the City will not take it and how the pressures on borrowing limits or public expenditure targets are such that there is no room for manoeuvre will, in July and August, somehow miraculously turn out to be an ability to produce tax cuts and PSBR reductions when the Chancellor produces his Budget. I hope that, when all that dialogue goes on, given that there is now more flexibility, there will be a recognition that the Government's task is one not only of economic purpose but of securing a wider social and political purpose which is not compatible with the squalor and hopelessness of inner city Britain.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I remind the House that the 10-minute limit on speeches is now in operation, and I appeal for the co-operation of those who are called.

7.12 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Any Member who represents a constituency in the north-west or any other region cannot fail to agree with the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) about the need for some assistance for the disadvantaged areas.

The right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) said that the Government's monetary policy was not wholly convincing. That is one way to put it. I found the Chancellor almost insultingly dismissive. His infatuation with money supply seems to have come to an end and the theory behind the seven lean years has been dissipated. We should rejoice at the conversion of one whose opinions have hitherto been held very strongly.

The Financial Times leader on 21 March said:

"The plain fact concealed by this technical bashfulness is that the monetary policy is by now in an almost total mess."

I do not deplore that. The Chancellor is at last being realistic, and I welcome that note of realism.

This is the first Budget in this Parliament that makes no serious attempt to reduce unemployment. The Chancellor now believes that we have passed the point of no return and that high unemployment will never be materially improved before the next election. He therefore thinks that it is better to spend money not on what he considers to be meaningless measures but on conferring benefits on the better-off, in the hope that they who have gained from the Government might express their gratitude at the next election.

So it is that there remain, and will continue to remain, more favoured parts of the country and more favoured sectors of our national life. It must be emphasised, because this is the cause of the discontent and anger in the north and the other regions, that preference is shown to the south and the City of London, and that this preference is an artificial and Government-made preference due wholly to their policies of a high pound, high interest rates and a contempt for any industrial policy.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) put it well, when he said that the high FT index leads to short-term profits to prevent takeover bids coming in, as unwelcome as they are. So we sacrifice the long-term investment and expansion for the short-term profits that are a direct consequence of the actions of the City of London. Such thinking lies behind the paucity even of sops to the unemployed. We have had statistical tricks and deceptions designed to delude us into believing what is unbelievable—that unemployment is not worsening.

It is easy to remove people from the unemployment register on the grounds that they are not really looking for work, as the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) pointed out. We know that the higher the levels of unemployment, the more pointless it is for many of the 500,000 unemployed for more than three years to continue the charade of searching for employment. The higher the levels of unemployment, the higher the number of those who genuinely cannot find work and so give up looking for it.

The Chancellor's action on capital transfer tax is one of the most disgraceful parts of the Budget. It is a shameful proposal. The Chancellor has replaced what was a useful tax with a voluntary donation payable only by the miser or the negligent. The principles of the tax were sensible and equitable. The enjoyment of the capital that an individual creates for himself is the right of that individual. It is for him to enjoy the wealth that he has created. The enjoyment of capital by virtue of birth has long been regarded as eminently suitable for high and enforceable taxation. That was the basis of the death duties when they were first introduced, of estate duties and, more recently, of the capital transfer tax.

The approach had been to make enforceable that which had been avoided. Under the Government, the tax has been emasculated, first by the reduction in the rates of tax, particularly on lifetime gifts, and then by the 10-year rule whereby one starts all over again every 10 years. Now, we are back to a tax made even more optional because of the greater sophistication of the insurance market. The Chancellor will be taxing only those who were improvident or over-cautious in not divesting themselves of their wealth. Those who repent of their lack of foresight and endeavour to make hurried gifts towards the end of their lives will be penalised.

The Chancellor has decided that the period of repentance should be fixed at seven years, but insurance companies are even now gearing themselves to cover the seven-year rule. So sophisticated are the new instruments that will be devised that there will be virtual freedom from capital transfer tax, as it is now, or inheritance tax as it will be called, for those who are even remotely well advised.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer prides himself on abolishing certain taxes and reducing others. He prides himself on abolishing investment income surcharge, development land tax and national insurance surcharge, which was created when circumstances were different. Then there were high levels of employment and demand was overheating, but we now have quite different problems of unemployment and the need to increase subsidies.

The Chancellor prides himself on abolishing the capital transfer tax. He has reduced the higher levels of income tax and he is equivocating about the capital gains tax, which may be the next one for abolition—after all, it now brings in less than stamp duty, which the Chancellor has cut in half. The investment income surcharge abandoned the distinction between earned and unearned income — the right and proper distinction that all previous Governments had accepted. There is a difference. There are costs associated with the earning of income such as travel to work, meals out, clothing and so on. There is also the underlying security of capital compared with the insecurity of employment, particularly now.

The Chancellor also abolished the development land tax, which attempted to tax development values created by the community. Its disappearance is yet another bonus to the wealthy. Truly, the rich have never had it so good.

Like many in the debate, I take issue with the Chancellor on belittling the value of oil to our economy. Rarely has the beneficiary of great good fortune been so contemptuous of that good fortune. Having won the pools, he claims that his success is due to his merit, and because he has squandered the oil revenues on the high exchange rates that damaged our industry, brought in imports and allowed the avoidance of any balance of payment difficulties, there has been postponement of any attempt to rectify our underlying weakness. How does the Chancellor think that France, Germany or Japan would have dealt with large oil revenues? Are they a good thing or a bad thing? They would have transformed their economies, which were good enough even before that.

But, most importantly, the balance of payments has been the constricting aspect of our economy in all the post-war years. It has been a dominant factor in all of those 35 years. Stop-go was due not to overheating but to balance of payments difficulties and the holding of a reserve currency. What would Rab Butler and Reg Maudling have done if, at a stroke, they had found themselves relieved of these balance of payments problems?

Oil is of enormous importance and its price is also important to us. We should have a view about the price that we are able to obtain for our products. We sell oil cheaply because of an ideology. But a trading nation should not be able to afford an ideology when it comes to something so important to us. Consequently, we should speak to OPEC and should try to get what we can for our assets. Having obtained it, we should put that money to good use in industry, in the deprived areas of our country and in the expansion of our manufacturing base. That is how we should use it, and that is how we should proceed.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): I should like to use 30 seconds of the 10 minutes allotted to me to comment on the speeches of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) and of my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). I take much of what my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley said, especially as I have been a leader in one of the deprived inner city areas, but the most successful experiments have been controlled by central Government with central Government money. I believe that he should bear that point in mind. I treat the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne as a right hon. Friend, but he is a far better Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee than he is a Budget analyst.

The Budget was highly creative. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has managed to squeeze virtually a quart out of a pint pot. I thank him for his provisions on charities. I need say no more than thank you. It was good work; well done. We have made a good start on the share owning democracy with the personal equity plan proposals, but it is only a start. I also say well done for the 1p cut in the standard rate. Whatever colleagues may feel, all the evidence shows that cutting taxes is the best way of boosting long-term jobs and of reducing unemployment.

I repudiate the idea that tax cuts are in conflict with job creation. Although Government expenditure on subsidised jobs may, and I hope will, lead to short-term results, new jobs that are financially self-supporting in the long term have to satisfy market demand. Tax cuts remain the most effective way of increasing that demand.

I am not sure whether the Budget is stimulative or restrictive. At the end of the debate, perhaps I may be told how my right hon. Friend the Chancellor sees it. For example, there is a PSBR of £7 billion with, in addition, £4·25 billion of public asset sales compared with £2·5 billion last year. An analysis of that would suggest that it is a stimulative Budget. But we have lost £5·5 billion of oil revenues, which have to be allowed for in any calculation. Consequently, in a sense, one could say that it is a restrictive Budget. I am not sure whether it is stimulative or restrictive, and commentators in the City are none too sure either.

I query why my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is so coy about fixed capital expenditure. After all, major items of capital expenditure such as the Channel tunnel, Stansted and all the activities, for example, in the east of London were previously substantially just public sector investment. But now there is a mixture. So my right hon. Friend the Chancellor did his cause a slight disservice in not trumpeting the success of that mixed investment. However, I am slightly worried that if interest rates do not fall they may restrict the growth of future capital investment.

I am also worried about North sea oil. It is fortuitous that most of the rig contracts are on a one to two-year basis, so my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has a little time in which to make suitable adjustments. Although it was right to have windfall taxes when oil prices were in the high $30, it must be recognised that we are not likely to return to such figures. The marginal cost in the North sea is perhaps $20 a barrel, and even that seems hardly attainable in the near future. In the United States there is an automatic adjustment below $20 a barrel in terms of the removal of windfall taxes. The North sea is important not only to Aberdeen but to a whole plethora of companies in the midlands, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will ensure that the tax element is not too restrictive.

British Leyland has already been mentioned. It is not for me to dwell on who initiated the discussions with General Motors. However, it might be a subject for the PAC to consider. Nevertheless, I am sure that Land Rover should be sold to the management. It is not surprising that that company should have suffered; it has been deprived of investment resources for 12 to 15 years. Leyland Trucks reputedly has the best product line in Europe, while Bedford trucks reputedly has the worst. One might reflect that Leyland could take over Bedford trucks rather than the reverse.

Last year's Budget was a "Budget for jobs." Any job stimulation takes time to work through. I can speak only for the east midlands, which is my part of England, but unemployment in Northampton is now falling to less than 10 per cent. Last Tuesday, I was somewhat dumbfounded to hear the Leader of the Opposition say:

> "The expansion of the jobs clubs for advice is more a taunt than a support for the unemployed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who must be acquainted with the facts, must know that people will regard that as nothing more than an additional opportunity to have a chat and a cup of tea. In some ways that is an advantage in itself, because unemployment can be an extremely lonely condition, but that is about as far as it goes". —[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 186.]

On the following day, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) mixed up the job start allowance scheme and job clubs. It was quite obvious that he did not understand the difference between the two, and had never visited any of the trial areas. It is not good enough for Opposition spokesmen to criticise such new dimensions when they do not even know what they are all about.

There have been 30 experiments on job clubs. One of those experiments is in Northampton. In about six months we have handled well over 100 applicants from among the long-term unemployed, and of those 65 per cent. have found long-term jobs. It is not just a cup of tea and a chat. People have to come on four mornings a week for two weeks. They are given help in how to apply for jobs and are given free telephone calls, mock interviews, help with their curricula vitae, postage facilities, a room with a typewriter and a room with photocopying equipment. Indeed, they are given general help with how to get a job.

The public has a great deal more confidence in a Government who carry out pilot schemes which, when found successful, as the job club has been in Northampton, are then introduced nationally than it has in the Leader of the Opposition or in the Opposition's economic spokesman. Those right hon. Gentlemen do not understand the difference between job clubs and job starts and cannot be bothered to visit them.

This is a creative Budget. We have two more to come in this Parliament in 1987 and 1988 and I look forward to a 25 pence standard rate of income tax in that time. The economy is growing and inflation is falling, and because of that we will see a considerable reduction in unemployment.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I must declare an interest as president of ASTMS. That gives me an opportunity to say that we recently won the political fund ballot by a massive majority. That will not bring any joy to the faces of Members on the Government Benches, but it is certainly good news for the Opposition.

The Budget is totally irrelevant and has nothing whatever to do with the problems that are facing us. As has been said several times, despite the drop in oil prices, the Chancellor has suddenly found that he has £1 billion to give away. To whom did he give that money? Did he give it to the people who are facing problems, to the poor or to the unemployed? Did he use it for the benefit of manufacturing industry? He did not. He used it to reward those who already have quite a lot of money anyway, to reward the wealthy.

The penny reduction in income tax will benefit those who earn the most. What is the business expansion scheme? It means that the rich can use their dividend windfalls, the rebates from the taxman, to invest or gamble in schemes which are supposedly for small businesses. Even the Chancellor had to admit that a lot of money will go into farmland and development. The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligan) talked about the abolition of the tax on lifetime gifts. That scheme is a scandal. What relevance does it have to industrial constituencies like mine in the north? What relevance does it have to the problems of Merseyside, to the north-east, to Scotland or to Wales? What relevance does it have to the impoverished north as against the prosperous south? It has none whatever. It will not begin to solve any problems.

I am sorry that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is not here. He introduced the debate in his usual manner of the Chingford charm school. His method is to denigrate his opponents, to be short on facts, to say nothing about Government policy and to present it overall with the manners of a house-trained aardvark. He has not changed at all. His chief topic was inflation. As has been reasonably said, our inflation rate is still higher than the inflation rates of our competitors. It is higher than the rates in Japan, the United States, Canada, France and West Germany. What a price we have had to pay for getting inflation down. We in the north and the unemployed have had to pay that price. Nothing in the Budget will do anything for the unemployed.

The Chancellor missed a great opportunity because he could have used that £1 billion to stimulate employment. He could have used it for public works and to develop our infrastructure. The right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) talked about the inner cities, but regenerating the inner cities means far more than giving Liverpool a garden centre. It is about building houses which the council in Liverpool has been trying hard to do in face of all the restrictions. It is about building the roads and the docks that we need and about building schools and hospitals. Schemes like that would provide real jobs.

The Government have no strategy for industry. They are quite happy to rely on privatisation and to try to bring about mergers that have collapsed. That happened in the case of General Motors and Leyland Vehicles. We look forward to hearing the facts when they come out and learn what part the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster played in that. Apparently, he initiated it and then advised against it. The Government have allowed the American company Sikorsky to take a stake in our only independent helicopter manufacturer. As we have seen, the trade unions there which supported the employers are now paying for that support because we now see Westland withdrawing recognition from the foremen and chargehands at Weston-super-Mare. Because of the American influence, will we see a non-union company develop at Westland?

The amount of money sloshing about in the City has given rise to a spate of mergers. There is a proposed merger between Allied-Lyons and Elders IXL. We have seen the bid for the Distillers Company, first by Gulliver and then by Guinness, and there has been an attempt by GEC to take over Plessey. What relevance has that for employment? The spate of takeovers will lead to asset stripping, and unemployment will grow. The Government are not prepared to do anything about any of those things. The Budget should have been used to develop an industrial strategy, but all that it does is react too late to the needs of industry and crisis piles upon crisis.

The Government have no policy, and it is not just the Opposition who are saying that they ought to have a policy for industrial regeneration, because voices are also being raised on the Government side. I wish that some of the people saying that the Government ought to have a fiscal policy to begin to regenerate industry had been giving the same message when they were in Cabinet. We seem to hear them only when they resign. As the number of resignations from the Government grow, so the number of voices grow that say we ought to do something about the regeneration of industry. Nothing is done.

The only thing talked about by most Conservative Members who have spoken is the benefit that will accrue to the City, the benefits that will accrue to those who have and who are not interested in British manufacturing industry, but are more likely to invest in manufacturing industry in rival companies in Japan or the United States or in the developing world. Those pople are not interested in regenerating British industry or in creating prosperity.

The Government ought to use their fiscal policy to ensure that the banks, the insurance companies and the City institutions invest in British industry. Failure to do that will mean that not only will more and more people join the ranks of the unemployed, but we will also become a low tech country. The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) said the rate of inflation in Greece is higher than ours. That is the level to which Conservative Members are prepared to stoop. They believe that in industrial terms we can be compared to Greece and Portugal. I am happy to say that there are others with more vision, but we cannot expect vision from a Government who are leaderless, rudderless and powerless to stop the ship of state drifting on to the rocks of destruction.

The sooner this Government make way for a Government who are prepared to put the interests of the British people first, especially those of the ordinary people, the better. The sooner the Government end the great divide between north and south, the better. Instead of confrontation, there should be compassion. We should use all our resources to bring people together. We should begin to rebuild the base of manufacturing industry on which the Government were created. We should be assisting the new industries of the future. Although this Government will not do that, I hope that we shall not have to wait three years before it is done by a new Government.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Nearly seven years ago, my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson) arrived for the first time at Treasury Chambers. He found as Chancellor of the Exchequer my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Sir G. Howe) who is now Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary. In the early months of 1980, the then Chancellor and the then Financial Secretary established for the then Government and their successor what is described as the medium-term financial strategy. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for the consistency and persistency of purpose which he and his predecessor have shown in managing our economy during the past seven years. Consistency and persistency in economic policy have been tragically lacking in the fashioning of British economic policy since the war.

When my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) formed his Administration on 18 June 1970, it was not his intention that we should pursue a statutory prices and incomes policy. It was not his intention that there should be a dramatic increase in the money supply in the closing years of his Administration. It was not the Labour party's policy, when it came into power in the early days of March 1974, that, before barely two years were out, it should go cap in hand to the International Monetary Fund and reverse some, although not all, of the disastrous policies which it had been pursuing in the two preceding years.

What has marked out this Government, not only from the two whom I have mentioned but from all previous Governments since the war, is that we have had consistency of purpose. Consistency of purpose offers for the British people not only the best prospect of economic growth but the best long-term prospect of creating more jobs.

The shadow Chancellor for the Liberal party—the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon)—is not in his place, but the solitary representative of the Liberal party, the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells), is welcome. We listened with considerable interest to the hon. Member for Truro tell us that, if we had a Liberal Chancellor, there would be a prices and incomes policy with statutory back-up.

Mr. Richard Ryder (Mid-Norfolk): He did not explain.

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend is right. Who ever heard a Liberal explain anything with cogency or conviction?

On the second day of the Budget debate the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was challenged, wisely, by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) on what would be the public sector borrowing requirement if the right hon. Gentleman happened to be in Great George street. The right hon. Gentleman replied:

"I shall give the figure in a moment."

He said that the amount would be considerably more. He continued:

"Before dealing precisely and directly with the question of the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples), I must deal with the Government's plans for tackling the unemployment crisis."—[Official Report, 19 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 309.]

[Mr. Gow]

Did the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook do what he had promised and deal precisely and directly with the question? He did not. I hope that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) will answer the question that his right hon. Friend did not answer.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) said that he thought that this year's PSBR could be £500 million more than the £7 billion figure which has been wisely chosen by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley is entitled to put forward that view—the target of the PSBR is a matter of judgment. I do not believe that, if we had taken a more relaxed view about the PSBR, we would have shown consistency of purpose during the successive dramas of the Falklands war, the miners' strike and the dramatic reduction not only in the price of oil but in the revenue from oil.

I believe that the level of the PSBR has a crucial influence on interest rates. No one is a keener advocate of lower interest rates than my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley. He is the first person to say that we must encourage our industrial manufacturing base. I believe that the surest way in which we can encourage our manufacturing industry is by following that policy of sound money and honest finance which is the best prospect of reducing interest rates.

If I praise my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for his cautious and prudent Budget, I praise him also for his new imaginative scheme to encourage the wider ownership of shares. Nothing has caused greater happiness among Conservative Members than the way in which, since my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister arrived at Downing street, between 925,000 and 950,000 people—it will be more than 1 million people by the time of the next Budget—whom the Labour party wanted to keep as tenants in perpetuity in the public sector have become home owners. I see a former Minister for Housing and Construction—the right hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson)—in his place.

Mr. Winnick: What about private tenants?

Mr. Gow: The hon. Gentleman should contain himself. He may get a chance to catch your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I ask the hon. Gentleman to remain silent.

This increase in home ownership has become accepted by some Labour Members. At the next election, there will not be the same commitment by the Labour party as there was at the last election to repeal our Acts of 1980 and 1984. They may seek to amend them but they will not repeal them. In the past seven years, we have moved the centre of British politics to the right. I predict that the Labour party is fearful lest our new plans for encouraging share ownership should prove to be as popular with the people as was our policy of offering them choice. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor, in extending the opportunities for share ownership, wishes to extend opportunities and choice ever more widely. This is really the people's Budget—[Laughter.] Do you remember, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the Labour party laughed when we promised that we would give tenants the opportunity to become owners? Today the Labour party laughs when we are giving to others the opportunity to become owners of capital—an opportunity that they would never have had before.

We have heard from Labour Members and even from the spokesman—now vanished—for the Liberal party that if only the Government would spend more money we would be able to abate what, by common consent, is the tragedy of unemployment. The Labour party should remember its own record of public expenditure and the consequences of that irresponsible expenditure: high interest rates and high inflation. It was those interest rates, that high inflation and that excessive borrowing—often undertaken in the name of compassion—that laid the fearful grounds of avoidable unemployment. In the longer term it is essential that the Government should persevere in their policy of lower borrowing, lower interest rates and insisting that this country, like others, should get rid of overmanning. Only in that way will we have a better prospect of more jobs in the future.

I repeat my congratulations to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and look forward to another two Budgets in this Parliament.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): If the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) describes last week's Budget as a people's Budget, he will find that it will not be only Opposition Members who laugh.

The hon. Gentleman referred to wider share ownership. I shall not argue about whether or not that would be a good aim. However, we have heard about the 2 million people who bought shares in British Telecom. I am fairly confident that in two or three years that number will have been drastically reduced and the shares will be in the hands of the big institutions.

In opening the debate, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster referred to difficulties inherited from the Labour Government. I am not here to defend the Labour Government or to argue about whether those charges were correct, but the present Government have now been in power for seven years and they cannot continue, year after year, to say that they are not responsible. A time must come when they must take responsibility for the state of the country.

Most people looked to the Budget for a two-pronged attack on unemployment and poverty. Last Tuesday, the Chancellor made no claim to attack either problem. Had he done so, the claim would have been impossible to sustain. When we remember what happened to the unemployment figures after the right hon. Gentleman announced a Budget for jobs, perhaps it is just as well that he made no similar claim on this occasion.

The Budget resembled a gift of little value well presented in a nice package. The Chancellor's casual and frivolous comment on the prospect of the other half of the oil revenue disappearing over the next 25 years seemed to me to be complacent and irresponsible. Had it not been for the oil revenues in recent years, the United Kingdom might well have been obliged to file its petition in bankruptcy.

The tax on petrol will have serious repercussions, particularly in Scotland where petrol is generally dearer than in the rest of the country and where rural areas and islands are dependent on road transport. If the right hon. Gentleman really believes that the oil companies should absorb the new tax, he should take the necessary action to oblige them to do so. Those hungry hyenas will not co-operate with him otherwise.

The hon. Member for Eastbourne was pleased with the personal equity plan, which allows for relief of taxes on investments of £50 per week. With the appalling unemployment figures and widespread poverty, most of our fellow citizens will regard that measure as a joke in poor taste. Many of them do not have that amount to live on. Even from the capitalist viewpoint, I gather that if one lifts the shares when the stock market is dropping, the tax relief will not be forthcoming.

I welcome the action taken on charities. At last the iniquitous VAT on distress alarms, welfare vehicles for the disabled and so on is to be removed. It should never have been imposed. I also welcome the relief on employee donations to charities and the relief to companies on one-off gifts, which should be of substantial help to many worthy and needy causes. I am sure that that aspect of the Budget will receive universal approval.

I also support the increased duty on cigarette tobacco. As a pipe smoker I should declare an interest, but I agree that tobacco in general is a legitimate object for raising revenue, with improved health as a bonus—although I suspect the Chancellor would be taken aback if everyone gave up tobacco at the same time.

The wealthy section of society has been handed substantial increments by the abolition of tax on lifetime gifts. I agree with the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) that it is a disgrace that that tax should be abolished at such a time. When one thinks of the lack of funds for the universities, the cutting of student grants and so on, the abolition of that tax is iniquitous.

The reduction of a penny in income tax is gimmickry. Everyone wants more money, but the Prime Minister and the Chancellor evidently believe that people are all hungry materialists with no higher aim in life than a reduction in income tax. The Government boast about the reduction in income tax, but the same Government imposed 15 per cent. VAT on almost all goods and services. In my view, many people would forgo tax reductions if that helped the unemployed and the old-age pensioners who have suffered severely this winter. The money could be better used in providing schools, hospitals and houses. Our housing stock is a serious problem that some Government will have to face in four or five years.

It is nonsense to reduce income tax when the Health Service is in dire straits. The DHSS quotes statistics about more doctors and nurses but the public knows that the Health Service and the hospitals are at crisis point. That penny could have been used for education, for the universities, or for improving student grants. I and my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) will join the alliance in voting against the reduction in income tax. Even British business puts tax cuts far behind help for the unemployed in its list of priorities. The Government might have taken their friends' view into account.

The Budget was a political, not an economic, one. I hope and believe that the Government will pay the political price.

Sir Julian Ridsdale (Harwich): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a prudent and cautious Budget. Looking after the country's finances is no different from looking after the finances of a family. At times one has to be cruel to be kind. It is not easy to restrain Government expenditure, especially when unemployment is rising so severely, and when we are already spending about £2·5 billion on employment and training measures in 1986, increasing to nearly £3 billion in 1988. However, let us remember that every £100 million spent on employment measures comes from other businesses and other people in employment. Squeeze them too hard by higher taxes or higher interest rates and one destroys hundreds of thousands of jobs that would otherwise be lasting jobs.

That is why I have supported all along the restraints on Government spending, which I am glad to underline have now got us to the position where my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is able to reduce interest rates and point to a growth rate this year of 3 per cent.—1 per cent. more than is estimated this year for Japan—with inflation moving, I hope, somewhere near that figure, too.

We hear a lot about industrial planning and helping industry, but from my visits to industry—especially recently to the exciting KTM factory in Brighton, part of the Vickers Group which is making machine centres—I find general agreement that the best way for the Government to help manufacturing industry is by lowering interest rates and working for stable exchange rates. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) said, we are unable to reduce interest rates unless we have a stable public sector borrowing requirement. That is why I join him in being nervous about some of the luxuries that at this moment my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) wishes to have.

In my view, at the moment we must take care of our international competitiveness which is being threatened by the United Kingdom paying higher increases in wages than West Germany, Japan or the United States, which are helped by far lower tax bases than we have.

The Social Democratic party and the Liberal party oppose the reduction of 1p in the basic rate of income tax, yet, to quote from the speech of the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) in the debate on 20 March:

> "In recent years, unit labour costs in Britain have continued to increase consistently compared with the costs of our major competitors. That must stop."—[Official Report, 20 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 462.]

I agree with what he says, but surely the Budget helps in this respect. Everybody agrees that the single person earning £140 a week—that is the average wage in my constituency—is paying too much tax. I admit that I thought that that person would benefit from higher thresholds rather than from the basic rate reduction in income tax. On the contrary, as my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury told us on 19 March, that person will gain a 95p a week reduction in the basic rate, compared with 69p a week for an equal cost increase in allowances.

I am glad that those people will have £1·70 more in their pay packets as a direct result of the Budget. For a married couple on average earnings, the figure is £2·59 a week. For the employee on average earnings, the reduction in the basic rate, plus the increase in thresholds, is the equivalent of an increase of £4 a week in gross pay. I am surprised that although the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party are complaining about Britain's international competitiveness they complain when the Government take 1p off the basic rate of income tax, which will help to alleviate this problem, and yet intend to oppose it in the Lobby.

This pay increase does not damage the competitiveness of British industry and does not put other people's job, or that employee's job, at risk. As the Chancellor said, this is a springboard Budget for making our industry more competitive, but with limited resources available this year because of the £5 billion spent on the miners' strike last year and the £6 billion fall in oil revenues—lost because of the change in the oil price. I hope that we can have more meaningful tax reductions from the springboard that the Chancellor has put in place, because that is the best way to stop our international uncompetitiveness. That is why I am so surprised that the Social Democratic party and the Liberal party do not see this.

Finally, I turn to the wild promises of the Labour party which have been costed at £24 billion, with promises of £3·5 billion extra for pensioners. It all sounds so like a repeat of the disastrous policies between 1974 and 1979 that led to runaway inflation and the erosion of the lifetime savings of so many pensioners. Nevertheless, I should be wrong if I did not point to the 18·9 per cent. increase in rates which we are having to face in Essex this year and to the heavy heating bills that pensioners are having to face because of the severe winter. Proper indexation of income thresholds for pensioners in the Budget will help, but I would urge the Government to do more ahead of the promised reform of local government finance to help pensioners because they have been so badly hit by these large rate increases.

Surely there is no better way of doing that than by giving next year a very generous Christmas bonus as a dividend to pensioners to share in our growing prosperity, to assess the present Labour promises and to remind pensioners that twice the Labour Government cut the Christmas bonus in those disastrous days between 1974 and 1979. Compared with those days, Britain is back on the rails and heading towards an age of prosperity. But let us make no mistake. We shall have that age of prosperity only if we keep a Conservative Government in power.

8.7 pm

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): On a number of occasions this evening hon. Members have referred to previous Labour Governments. I want to make one clear statement and then say no more about it. Whenever Labour Governments have made mistakes, they made them because they were following the type of policies that had been set down by members of the Conservative party. In other words, they accepted Conservative ideas rather than Socialist ideas. That is why Labour Governments have made some fairly serious mistakes from time to time. When I have been in the House I have said so. I trust that a future Labour Government will not make the kind of mistakes that Labour Governments made in the past.

It has also been said many times during the course of this debate that the problem is that workers earn too high wages. In an exchange with the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster I said that this is the old, old story. I first heard it when I was six or seven years of age. I did not understand then what it was all about. However, I have always been told that our economic problems are due to the fact that the awful working people earn too much and that if only their wages were cut everything would be all right. The problem is that when their wages are cut, as happens in areas of high unemployment—for example, on Merseyside and elsewhere—it does not lead to an increase in employment. All it does is to depress the condition of the people and make the situation worse.

The best thing that I read about the Budget appeared in yesterday's edition of The Observer. I am not reading The Sunday Times at the moment, so I read The Observer with even greater interest. What did The Observer say yesterday? It said:

"There is a very British feeling in the land at the moment that enough has been done for the rich. Now should have been the time to ease the pain a little at the lower end . . . There is, too, a feeling that the money being made in the City is unseemly, that it is industry and jobs that matter and should be assisted. There was no need for the Chancellor to play silly games over a penny off income tax, less-than-expected increases on petrol, and nothing on beer or whisky."

The article ends with this statement:

"As Lord King commented, it is she who is in charge. And that means—goodnight, nurse. You are a fool to believe that public service or fair play matter. This is the day of the speculator and the inheritor, the greed of the oil companies and the slickness of the City operators. This is Mrs. Thatcher's Britain, 1986."

That is what the Budget is about. It is a rich man's Budget. It helps the rich but does not help the poor.

Also in The Observer—I am sorry to keep quoting The Observer but I think that it is of interest—there is the following:

"The Chancellor signally failed to provide any specific help for the country's poorest families. They did not even earn a mention in his speech, and welfare groups are bitter."

I should think that they are bitter because the people who gain—and it gives all the figures in the newspaper—are once again the higher income groups in this country. The ordinary working people and those who are not working have once again suffered under this Budget because it is in line with the ideological position of the Government. The Government are a very ideological Government. They believe that the capitalist system is the best of all systems. They ignore the fact that it is crumbling around their ears and that there is increased unemployment, poverty and misery amongst people. All they see is increased profits for some people and they believe that that proves what a successful society we have. We are in this position precisely because we have a capitalist economy with a capitalist Government carrying out capitalist policies.

I have no hesitation in saying that the only real answer is Socialist policies. I get a little upset when I hear some people from my party apologising for our past policies and for our Socialist concepts. I do not apologise for them and I never will. I well remember what the 1945 general election manifesto said. It was a grand manifesto. We should think of what happened at that time and the crisis that the people of this country had to face. The soldiers, airmen and sailors were coming back from the war. There was a danger that we would have a problem similar to that which occurred after the first world war with an immediate increase in mass unemployment. That was not the case. We did not have mass unemployment. The Government dealt with the problem and they did not drop their policies such as public ownership. They took into public ownership a whole series of industries, introduced a National Health Service and created the welfare state. They laid the basis for the society we have had since 1945.

I say to my comrades on the Front Bench—[HON. MEMBERS: "Comrades?"] Yes, comrades. I say to them, do not be mesmerised like rabbits in front of the Thatcher stoat. The way to handle the Thatcher stoat is to deal with it positively and get rid of it. The answer is to carry out the sort of policies that were carried out in 1945, which are still basically the policies of my party. That is the way to deal with the crisis. The Budget is a disgrace and a disaster. It is a Budget for the rich and at the next election we shall have a change in Government. That Government will reverse the whole policy, trend and system we have been suffering under for the past few years.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): There is no doubt that falling oil prices have presented British industry with an outstanding opportunity to increase its exports, win a larger share of world markets and orders for jobs. As the Chancellor made clear in his Budget speech, industry

"will only be able to seize that opportunity if it meets two conditions. First, it must keep firmer control of its labour costs. Secondly, it must spend more of its much healthier level of profits on investing for the future in research and development and in training."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 169.]

I want to consider those points because I believe that they are critical to whether we succeed as a competitive trading nation.

For a long time Conservative Members have spoken about the responsibilities of trade unions. I believe that it is imperative that we now alert the nation to the responsibilities of employers, particularly the importance of industry and employers controlling wage costs, and investing in research and development and training. I believe that those three items are conditions precedent to our sustaining success into the 21st century.

In January the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development published a survey which focused on our labour market since 1979. It found that in Britain the failure of wages to adjust to lower inflation and increasing unemployment was at the core of our unemployment difficulties. Further, the OECD considered that the failure of Britain to moderate wages ruled out the option of any general reflation of the economy to reduce unemployment because it concluded that, without greater wage moderation, any stimulus to demand would simply be dissipated in higher inflation.

The OECD further found that in other developed countries higher unemployment had led to a downward pressure on wages, in stark contrast to Britain, where earnings have continued to rise steeply irrespective of unemployment levels. In those circumstances, the OECD concluded, pessimistically, that there is little that macroeconomic policy can do to reduce unemployment.

None of that should come as any surprise. Only last summer the House of Lords Select Committee on Overseas Trade published its findings. It asked its statistical staff to produce figures for unit labour costs for manufacturing in Britain and elsewhere. It found that since 1962 labour costs per unit of output in America had hardly doubled, in West Germany they had slightly less than doubled, in France they rose four times, but in Britain they had risen six times.

The simple fact is that in those countries we consider to be the most well off—for example, West Germany and the United States—the rise in wage costs has been the smallest. Indeed, in 1984 real average earnings in the United States were lower than in 1962, in contrast to Britain where we simply continue to pay ourselves as a nation more than we earn. Average earnings were up by 8·3 per cent. last year compared to inflation of only 5·5 per cent. There has to be a new sense of responsibility in pay claims if Britain is to improve her competitive position and if we are to have any chance of significantly increasing the flow of new jobs.

Let us all be clear about at least two things. First, extra spending of the type and degree consistently advocated by the Opposition — borrowed money pumped into the economy — would not go towards output and jobs. It would simply disappear in higher pay and prices. Secondly, pay is one of the main reasons, if not the main reason, why we have such a disastrous unemployment total. Even unemployment based on the lack of industrial capacity reflects excessive pay awards of the past. Of course, people like getting wage increases well above inflation but that has a cost for the whole community. It has a cost in lost jobs.

In successive years the Government have reduced the burden on business, for example, by abolishing the national insurance surcharge, only to see industry placing a greater burden on its own back by allowing unit labour costs to soar because of excessive pay awards. Excessive pay awards mean that our goods cost more to make. Therefore, the goods cost more to buy, fewer are bought and fewer are then made. That results in higher unemployment.

Pay awards constantly that are ahead of inflation in the private sector also lead to pressures for greater public spending and greater taxation. Teachers, for example, are not complaining that their salaries have not kept pace with inflation; they know that they have. The teachers' complaint is that their pay has fallen behind the private sector and, understandably, they want to catch up. That inevitably means pressure for more public spending and thus more revenue from taxation, fuelled by the private sector failing to face up to the reality of the wage settlements in this country. I have a nightmare that some managers prefer having an overpaid workforce, as long as its numbers are kept to the minimum. They do not want to create new jobs if they can manage it. But we need more new jobs, and that means wage moderation now, and leadership from management and employers.

To that end, I am sure that the whole House will welcome the new proposals for profit sharing, the idea that part of the pay packet should be related to profit and performance. The suggestion that a significant slice could be taken off the tax burden of those who enter profit-sharing schemes is good news, and, further, can lead only to greater employee involvement, which is also good news. However, the stark reality is that employers and managers have to get a grip on spiralling wage costs if we are to get more people into jobs.

If we are to compete in the 21st century, industry has to invest more in research and development. Let us consider a few stark facts concerning just one key area — information technology. IBM's European data processing revenue of almost $10 billion equals the combined turnover of its 10 closest competitors, which illustrates the dominant position of the United States in advanced technologies. It is not surprising that Europe is estimated to import 80 per cent. of the personal computers that it requires, mainly from the United States. As for silicon chips, Europe's market share for the supply of advanced metal oxide semiconductors, which will dominate chip-making for the next few years, is just 6 per cent.

If we are to keep in the forefront of the new technologies that will dominate the 21st century, British companies must invest more of their profits in research and development, because if we do not invest in the future, we shall simply find ourselves struggling ever harder to preserve the industries of the past. Certainly, the British Government and the European Community are acting to stimulate industry to increase research and development. There is the Esprit programme, which concentrates on improving information technology, the BRITE programme, the RACE programme for broad band communication, and the Eureka programme to promote awareness of the practical opportunities that research might bring. If one wants to see the success of investing in research and development and of greater industrial collaboration in Europe, one has simply to look at Airbus and our aviation industry. Airbus, now successfully competing with Boeing, is winning orders and creating jobs. But British companies have to invest more in research and development, and they have to spend more on training.

A recent report called "Challenge to Complacency", commissioned by the Manpower Services Commission as a follow-up to the National Economic Development Office report entitled "Competence and Competition", condemned employers for their indifference to training. The report found that the vast majority of companies studied were not very interested in training and "had an attitude which bordered on complacency."

Indeed, few chief executives interviewed appeared to have much knowledge of the training activities undertaken by their firms. Compared with the United States, Germany and Japan, Britain's record of the training of adults is lousy, with training being seen not as an investment but, all too often, as an overhead to be reduced when times are difficult.

If we are to succeed, we have to become a nation of lifetime learners. The tools and the technology that are used can be same the world over. What makes the difference is what one does with that technology, and that means the skills and knowledge of those who are using the technology. That means industry having to invest more in training and in people. During the next five years the impact of new technology will involve something between half and three quarters of the nation's entire work force needing to update their skills just to keep pace with new technology.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Budget is imaginative and creative. It promotes wider share ownership; it stimulates greater growth; and it builds on the continuing improvements in our economy. But if Britain is to maximise opportunities presented by the Budget and falling oil prices, employers will have to realise that they have responsibilities to ensure common sense on wages, to invest in research and development, and to invest more in training.

Mr. Reg Freeson (Brent, East): I should like to make an observation on the remarks of the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry). If one wants the economic and social ethos to which he referred, national standards will have to be set. If one wants national standards to be set, it is the Government who should be in the lead on that. One will not get a willingness to undertake increased research and training, which the hon. Gentleman rightly emphasised, if at the same time the Government are cutting in those very areas in our educational establishments. That is perfectly true, and the hon. Gentleman should look at his figures.

Those who take pride in the financial strategy of the Budget, such as the Chancellor, and those who have applauded it, with a few exceptions, on Conservative Benches, are, in effect, applauding and taking pride in continued decay and mass homelessness in our inner cities, the physical decay and decline of our schools, as well as the services that are provided in many of them, and the continued decline of the less often mentioned areas of rural deprivation, which are often cheek by jowl with affluent "exurbs", as the Americans call them. Any pride in such a financial strategy means pride and applause for the things that I have mentioned and many others, too. One cannot have continued restrictions on public expenditure and investment and at the same time put one's hand on one's heart and complain about the crumbling of the inner cities, homelessness, decay in the state of our homes, particularly houses that elderly people live in, and decay in the schools, in our public services, our environment, and so on. The Government are reaching the stage where they are presiding over environmental slums in vast areas of our cities.

I shall concentrate on one or two of the things that I believe could have been dealt with in the Budget rather than comment too much, except indirectly, on what is in the Budget. Potentially, the main generator of economic revival would be what we loosely call the construction industry. In fact, it is a group of industries and services. Many reports have been emanating from that industry and others — the Confederation of British Industry, the Building Employers Confederation, the Federation of Civil Engineering Contractors, National Council of Building Material Producers, the Royal Institute of British Architects, the Duke of Edinburgh's study into housing conditions, the House-Builders Federation and the Housing Corporation. All the reports and studies have been pigeon-holed by the Chancellor and the Treasury. Not a thing has been done in the Budget to tackle any of the problems that have been identified in detail—not in general rhetoric—in those reports. Not a single thing is to be found in the Budget that tackles any of the over-urgent problems depicted and detailed in those reports. This is not the first time. We have had several years of that.

Therefore, our housing, schools, colleges, hospitals, roads, sewers, inner cities and deprived rural areas will continue to decline, decay and crumble. When that grows into rioting and other foul conditions in our cities, all the fine speeches and expressions of concern will mean nothing if nothing effective is done about that. Millions of people who are unemployed could be tackling some of those problems. They remain unemployed while huge fortunes are being made in the wasteful buying and selling of existing assets, when we could and should be conserving and creating assets. The strategy should be to create assets. We should invest in that, not in buying and selling.

Those are the issues which could have been dealt with, in part, by the Budget, and which I want to develop. Investment in infrastructure and capital works in public services could be increased without the risk of higher inflation. I agree with the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) that it could be done. Indeed, there could have been increased public sector borrowing without affecting inflation. That is shown analytically and conclusively in the full submissions by the sections of the industry to which I have referred, and by other bodies.

The Chancellor's response last week was that the appropriate policy was to keep borrowing low. I understood him to mean that he was talking about the private as well as the public sector. He did not refer specifically to the public sector borrowing requirement. Although it has not been stated, I have suspected for a long time that Government policy was directed to confining and restraining borrowing across the economy, irrespective of the public or private characteristics of the borrowing, but that they always concentrated on public sector borrowing. There is nothing new about that. It has been going on for years.

Ways could be found to increase investment in rented housing, the inner cities and infrastructure. It means more public sector borrowing. After all, we are borrowing for massively high unemployment. That is where the biggest burden lies. The burden is roughly equivalent to the revenues in the last five or six years from the North sea, which amount to thousands of millions of pounds annually. It would be far better to have a strategy directed to using that resource for the creation of assets rather than unemployment. I echo what the right hon. Member for Henley said on that score.

I shall put briefly to the Chancellor some proposals which could and should be adopted by the Government now without conflicting with what I believe to be their wrongful prejudice against increased public expenditure in such areas. Time forbids me from developing the proposals in detail. With his colleagues in other Departments, in particular the Department of the Environment, will the Chancellor take action to put a stop to the underspending on derelict land and development grants? Underspending occurs mainly because of the bureaucratic procedures employed by the Department of the Environment in processing the grants. Hundreds of millions of pounds are involved in the underspend. Each thousand pounds spent on one of those grants produces £6,000 or £7,000 of private investment.

Housing associations have experienced massive cuts in expenditure in recent years, as have local authorities. The housing associations have made detailed, not general, proposals to the Government to marry the grant expenditure, however limited, with private investment. They have worked out schemes in negotiation with building societies to couple the two organisations. There is one obstacle to that partnership approach — the Treasury. The Chancellor and the Treasury are forbidding housing associations to line up private capital with housing association grants which could double the effects of grant expenditure on rented housing. Instead of 15,000 homes a year, 30,000 could be started. I urge the Chancellor to take action.

Mr. Richard Ryder (Mid-Norfolk): The right hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson) bemoans the Government's low public expenditure. It comes as some surprise since he was happy enough to remain in a Labour Government between 1976, when the Government were forced to go to the International Monetary Fund, and 1979, when they were defeated at the polls. Public expenditure in real terms on the Health Service fell by 30 per cent. in that time, as it did on major road construction.

During the Budget debate Opposition Members such as the right hon. Member for Brent, South urge the Government to spend a great deal more money and to expand the public sector borrowing requirement. They have tried to depict the Government's prudent fiscal policy as a dogmatic experiment which no other sensible nation dares to follow.

In such circumstances it is reasonable to look abroad to discover whether Britain is, as the Opposition contend, the odd man out, or whether the truth is that other countries are pursuing identical fiscal policies to those of the Conservative Government in Britain. Needless to say, Governments of the centre Right in Japan and Germany are pursuing precisely the same policies as Her Majesty's Government.

What about democratic Governments led by the Left, particularly in Europe? What policies are they pursuing? Under President Mitterrand in France the Socialist Government introduced their budget in September last year. It was the toughest budget introduced by any French Government since the war. It involved huge public expenditure cuts across the board, but included—I must tell the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) — an increase in law and order expenditure. Defence expenditure was also increased by 2 per cent. President Mitterrand cut public expenditure on trade and industry. Public expenditure on the car industry was sliced through Renault. Expenditure on the steel-making industry through Usinov was sliced by a Socialist Government. Expenditure on social security was cut too. A person under the age of 25 in France, who has been unemployed for longer than six months, can be deprived of unemployment benefit. Psychiatric treatment in the French health service has been farmed out to the private sector. All that has happened under a Socialist Government.

What about Socialist Spain? The Socialist Government in Spain last year introduced the toughest ever budget since General Franco's time. That Government have sliced 20 per cent. from capital spending on infrastructure and nationalised industries. The Socialist Government in Spain have cut pensions. A new pensions reform law came into operation last August, and lower pensions will now be paid.

The same applies to Italy where the Socialist Prime Minister, Mr. Craxi, presented an austerity budget to the Italian Parliament last September. Health spending was to be curbed by raising prescription and other charges by at least 19 per cent., and by as much as 25 per cent. Italy imposed hefty cuts in welfare benefits and families with only one child are no longer to receive benefit. Concessionary rates for travel on railways and for electricity are to be cut. University fees, about which we hear so much, are to be raised significantly by that Socialist Government.

I have been talking about budgetary policies by Socialist Governments who have to grapple daily with the realities of office, rather than dallying in the sort of rhetoric of opposition that we have heard from the Labour party and the alliance in the last few days.

I have a little piece of good news for the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East. I have a small consolation for him. There is a Socialist Government in the democratic world which has pursued almost the same policies as he recommends we follow here. That Socialist Government is the Government of Australia.

The Australian Government have increased public expenditure and there have been six major consequences. During the past year the Australians have had to devalue their currency by 20 per cent. Interest rates in Australia under a Labour Government have hit 20 per cent. and small businessmen have been driven into bankruptcy. The inflation rate in Australia is double the OECD average and there is rising international debt in Australia. The Australian balance of payment problems are a cause for enormous concern. Lastly, industrial disputes are increasing rapidly in Australia.

All these problems are being encountered by a Labour Government in Australia who are putting forward, and have implemented, precisely the same policies that the British Labour party is suggesting should be followed in Britain, and which a Labour Government would introduce.

If Britain wants to embrace extravagant policies of the Left, it has only to look at what has happened in Australia. That which has happened in Australia would happen here if a Labour Government were elected. We should have double-digit inflation, and interest and mortgage rates of 20 per cent. We would have industrial strife on the scale of the 1960s and 1970s. We would have rising international debt, balance of payments problems and currency devaluation. It is because I do not wish these kind of Labour policies to be pursued in Britain or to witness their consequences if the Labour party is given the chance to form a Government that I shall be supporting my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the House divides. I congratulate him wholeheartedly on introducing an excellent Budget.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): There was a joker missing from the Budget statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that was exchange rate policy. The Government started out in 1979 with the view that markets could be trusted to manage exchange rates better than Governments could. They considered that Governments had no real power in the face of market forces and today's capital flows. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seems now to have abandoned these extreme views. He has recognised that the exchange rate is an important indicator and he took part in the Group of Five meeting in September 1985 when the main industrial countries agreed to take concerted action to move interest rates and exchange rates. Indeed they have moved in the directions needed to correct imbalances in cost competitiveness and trade that have done more damage to Britain than any other country.

The movement that has taken place seems to have exhausted the extent of the agreement. The United States might like the dollar to be lower, but Japan seems to think that the yen has risen enough. So where do we go from here? What is our national interest with the pound? What understanding should we seek from other industrial countries?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is slowly learning the lessons that are set out in the second special report in 1983 of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service that was produced at the end of the previous Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman is following very much the course that we recommended to him. Mechanistically he repeats the formula that is now a regular feature of financial statements. It is as follows:

"There is no mechanical formula for taking the exchange rate into account in assessing monetary conditions".

Last year the phrase was:

"There is no mechanistic formula".

But this year he goes on to give the exchange rate an independent role. He states:

"a balance must be struck between the exchange rate and domestic monetary growth consistent with the Government's aims for money GDP and inflation."

The "balance" of objectives which the Chancellor of the Exchequer talks about he may not like to describe as a mechanism, but there is a computer programme operating in the Treasury which comes remarkably close to doing what the right hon. Gentleman describes. The Government have a number of policy instruments, including fiscal policy, which they adjust annually in the Budget. Interest rates and intervention in the money and foreign exchange markets are instruments which they can adjust more frequently and even continuously. The effects on unemployment, growth, the balance of payments and inflation are not measurable continuously, and even shorter-term monthly measures are often not a reliable indicator of trends. The effects on the exchange rate and capital flows are, however, observable continuously, and are very important.

There is, therefore, a slowly moving background of final objectives and fiscal policy, and a rapidly moving foreground of market expectations, intervention, interest rate adjustments, and their effects on the exchange rate and capital flows. The shorter-term foreground and the longer-term background are part of the same scene. They interact and they have to be mutually consistent.

To set the background, it is necessary to attach priorities to the final objectives of growth, employment and stable prices. It is not a question whether unemployment matters. Of course it matters, even to the Chancellor. But the Chancellor is prepared, perhaps, to give less priority to the speed of reducing unemployment than the Opposition would. Any Chancellor will set the instruments at his disposal to achieve the best achievable balance of objectives given his priorities. That is broadly the content of the Budget speech and the Financial Statement and Budget Report, which includes forecasts of the expected outturn. It enables the House to judge the Government's priorities, and it also sets the expectations of the markets.

But one thing is for sure: events will not fulfil those expectations, especially for the most variable short-term indicators, such as the exchange rate and financial markets, which in the absence of any definite expectations can go all over the place.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer does not even spell our precisely his expectations for the exchange rate, which is said to be assumed to remain at broadly its present level. That may or may not be right. But what is done internally within the Treasury? The computer programme that I mentioned is operated by the Treasury. It indicates fiscal policy instrument levels that are appropriate to the balance of priorities or final objectives. But it also picks short-term rules which indicate the adjustment of, for example, interest rate changes which will be needed in response to movements of the exchange rate from its expected path. None of this leads automatically to policy adjustments. It is not in that sense a mechanism. But it does give guidance which, on the best evidence available, achieves a balance between objectives, and a coherence of shorter-term actions on interest rates and longer-term actions on fiscal policies.

This apparatus does use our old friend the Treasury model. It can handle various types of expectation formation and uncertainty, and select a policy which produces a reasonable result on models based on conflicting economic theories. Very much the same sort of action now emerges from the Treasury, London Business School and National Institute models, now that they are being more rigorously tested and compared. We have, therefore, a basis for a more pragmatic fiscal and monetary policy which properly reflects the Government's priorities at the national level.

But what about the international level? Can we trace the international repercussions and reactions? A fortnight ago, at a conference of the Brookings Institution in Washington, the first comparisons took place between the internationally linked model systems maintained by the Federal Reserve Board, the OECD, the Japan Economic Planning Agency, and nine other systems. The Treasury, the Bank of England and the IMF were all well represented so the Chancellor has his own reports of what took place. There were, of course, substantial differences, particularly among the outliers. But what impressed me was that in the models that mattered there was broad agreement on the sign and on the timing of effects of fiscal and monetary changes in the United States on the rest of the OECD, and conversely. It looked as if the apparatus was there to provide the analytical framework needed for international negotiation and co-operation in our mutual interests.

In the Treasury programme that I described, the level and weight of the exchange rate target has to be set externally. So, notionally, these are adjustable in international negotiation. If the exercise that the Treasury does is done on one of these international model systems, each country can be left to specify its own priorities, and the system will produce a set of exchange rate rules which would maximise the sum of benefits to all countries, or, perhaps more appropriately, maximise the minimum benefit to any one country. That does not, of course, dictate the outcome of negotiations but it gives it a sound analytical basis and, therefore, a better chance of success.

If the evidence of the conference is anything to go by, Britain now enjoys a comparative advantage in such work. It would be in the British interest if the Chancellor were to say rather more about his exchange rate policy and spell out the evidence on which it is based. Most importantly, it can encompass the hazards that remain on the oil price. I would not expect that to lead to our joining the EMS, but I would expect it to stimulate work by other Governments and the international organisations leading to developments in the EMS, in the context of wider international co-operation, in which we could join with the hope and expectation that we could avoid exchange rate wars and the gross misalignments of currencies which have done so much damage in recent years.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): The hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), who unfortunately is not in the Chamber, is much admired in the House for his consistency and sincerity. However, when he chose to argue that Labour Governments have only gone wrong in the past because they abandoned Socialism and that if only they had pursued red-blooded Socialism they would not have gone wrong, I could not help but reflect that the Labour Government were not pursuing Conservative policy when they were driven to the IMF. Frankly, over the course of the past four days of this debate the Opposition have presented us with a picture revealing a remarkable reluctance to come to terms with those aspects of previous Labour rule which led them invariably to shipwreck and which are being pursued and continued today, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder) said, by a Labour Government on the other side of the world.

It is very easy to mouth platitudes, to be in favour of everything progressive and to say that if only one was given the opportunity of putting such things into action then everything would be right. People who say that fail to come to terms with the fact that such a policy, when tried in the past, invariably led to failure.

The simple truth is that previous Labour Governments went wrong not because they failed to pursue red-blooded Socialism, but because Socialism is the locomotive of inflation—the locomotive which destroys jobs and leads to the social breakdown which has caused so much comment during this debate.

It is impossible, after more than 80 speeches during the course of the debate, for one of the last Conservative Back Bench speakers to contribute anything novel to the debate. It would not be worth while my trying to do that. Instead, I should like to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a number of points. I congratulate him and the Governor of the Bank of England on the way that they have handled the currency instability which occurred in January and February of this year. At the same time last year, when we had a period of currency instability, not everyone was universally happy with the way in which it was handled. However, there cannot be the slightest doubt that the way it was handled this year has been dramatically successful. Heads have been kept, and, at the very time when everyone was forecasting that things would go off course, that did not happen. Considerable praise is due to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and to the Governor of the Bank of England for handling things extremely well this year.

I also congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on continuing the policy adopted in previous years and on maintaining course. Many people think that each Budget should be a new beginning each year. Many wish to blot out previous years and think that it is possible to have a new beginning each year. Of course, this year's Budget is merely a development of a policy that has been carried on —thank goodness—for some years. I have no doubt that the measures taken last year will continue to have a beneficial effect upon economic activity during the course of next year and that the recent and new measures will take some time before they have their full impact on the economy. A Budget is not and cannot be a new beginning.

It is part of the progression of policy. My right hon. Friend deserves all praise for seeing it in that context and not in the way in which so many would have him view it.

I should also like to take this opportunity, perhaps belatedly, to congratulate my right hon. Friend on the elimination—I have forgotten just how long ago it was done—of the halfpenny from our currency. That had one very good effect during the course of the debate. The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon), representing the Liberal party, was not able to come to the House as he would have done in previous years and advocate not a penny reduction in the standard rate of income tax, but only half—a halfpenny reduction. The elimiation of the halfpenny from our currency has at least had the effect of forcing Liberals to stop trying to halve what everybody else is trying to do and saying that that was the correct judgment to make.

Many of the aspects of the Budget are to be welcomed. I welcome the schemes which will encourage saving. I have no doubt that other schemes will come forward in subsequent years.

I very much welcome the abolition of the lifetime gifts tax, and I commend to the House the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) who analysed that point clearly in his speech. It has been made very clear that the Liberal party is against the handing on of small businesses through families. They are in favour of small businesses, provided that they are not successful or grow to the point at which they come within tax limits. That humbug, which the hon. Member for Truro articulated, is clearly on the record. I know that in every constituency, including his own, people will realise the nonsense that he was speaking. We can understand the Labour party being completely against family businesses and all that that involves—its opposition to that is honest and straightforward — but the humbug and nonsense from the Liberal party has been clearly revealed for what it is.

A Budget offers the opportunity for developing existing policies. It should never be seen as a new beginning, as so many commentators inside and outside the House choose to see it. I hope that the Budget policy will continue to develop. However, I recognise that we are not as successful as we ought to be in certain matters.

As a country we are deficient in two major areas. First, as a general rule, English people—I choose that phrase carefully—hate selling. There are plenty of exceptions to that general rule. Many successful companies have prospered on that basis, but it is the general rule. We love people to buy from us but we hate the idea of going out and getting a sale. We shall not be successful as an economy until all companies, not just the best companies, recognise that they must go out into the market place and sell their products. That is not something that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will be able to make clear in his Budgets, but it shows that budgetary policy is only one aspect of the development of the economy. Much has to be done outside.

My second point is that Britain's training provision is desperately inadequate. I hope that companies will recognise much of what has been said during the debate and will use their new-found profits to invest much more heavily in research, development and training. Thank heaven, they are much more profitable than they were when the Labour party was in power.

Alas, it is not possible for me to develop my arguments. Without going into the judgments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley on the fiscal adjustment, the PSBR, and so on, I strongly commend his basic line of approach. I commend the Budget to the House.

8.59 pm

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): I want to make three short points. First, I hope that when my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) commends, as I am sure he will in his many speeches in the country, the lower cost of borrowing, he will explain to the country how that is consistent with his rather heroic attitude towards public expenditure generally. Those of us who admire and watch what he says will look forward to a further explanation on that point.

Secondly, I regret that in this Budget my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has effectively abandoned the principle of fiscal neutrality. He has suffered some important defeats in pursuit of that policy. He was defeated over cars and pensions and he has been defeated over mortgage interest relief. He won an important battle upon investment allowances and he has now, at least for the time being, given up the battle. Many Conservative Members applaud that retreat and speak with great approval of the various incentives that he has given to politically favoured interest groups. He has been skilful in his selection of those which he intends should benefit. But my right hon. Friend has persuaded me of the advantages of fiscal neutrality, and I hope that the time will come when the Tory party returns to that principle, although I accept that by returning to it we shall offend many of the interest groups that so often support us.

Thirdly, and finally, I wish to agree with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) in his criticisms of the observations in the Red Book about monetary policy. But I come to an entirely different conclusion from my right hon. and learned Friend. My right hon. and learned Friend wishes us to go into the EMS. I agree that there is a need for a discipline, but I would assert that disciplines in Britain are better if they are recognised to be internal disciplines—that we recognise that we are doing something not because we are ordered to do it by the IMF, or even the EMS, but because we recognise the social advantages of sound money.

I am somewhat amazed that many of those who wish us to go into the EMS are fierce supporters of our continued membership of the EEC. I am somewhat sceptical of that, but I conclude by saying that those who want us to go into the EMS may be doing the cause of Europe severe harm, because when the time comes to take deflationary action upon the economy if we go into the EMS, we can be certain that it will not be the Government of the day who are blamed, but the EMS and the other nations of Europe. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will continue her opposition to our going into the EMS.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): After the speech of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), the Chancellor may be surprised to know that I intend to begin my speech with a compliment to him. I always believe that credit should be given where it is due and for once I agree with the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), who described the Chancellor's Budget as clever and ingenious. I think that the words were originally used by other hon. Members—the right hon. Members for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) and for Worthing (Mr. Higgins)—but I agree that the Budget is clever, skilful and ingenious. As the Chancellor admitted at the beginning of his Budget statement, the fall in the price of oil and the resulting fall in the Government's income from the special taxes on oil revenues mean that the Chancellor is left with little room for manoeuvre within the framework of his principles and prejudices.

I admire the way in which the Chancellor presented the Budget under these circumstances, but I must make it clear that it is admiration of a sort that I give to the cleverness, skill and ingenuity of the professional cardsharp. The only difference was that the Budget deceived the ear rather than the eye, and already the commentators are beginning to realise the truth.

Let us consider, for example, what the Chancellor said about the fall in oil prices and the effect of that fall on the Government and on the economy. As I have already said, the Chancellor made, for him, a remarkable admission. He admitted that his room for manoeuvre was restricted by the fall in oil prices. However, later in his speech, as part of his constant attempt to disguise the dependence of the Government and the economy on North sea oil, he pointed out, quite fairly—I do not argue with the figures—that North sea oil accounts for only 5 per cent. of gross domestic product. The other sectors of the economy—manufacturing industry, agriculture, distribution, construction, public and private services—account for 95 per cent. of economic activity.

The mere statement of these figures constitutes a condemnation of the Government's strategy because the Chancellor is saying that his Budget, his ability to cut taxes or to increase public expenditure, his success and the Government's survival, depend not on the 95 per cent. of economic activity in Britain but the 5 per cent. of economic activity in and around the North sea. The truth is that the vital decisions at the heart of the Government's economic policy are taken not by the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, but by Sheikh Yamani and his colleagues in OPEC. They are taken without any reference to this country or the balance of our economic interests. It is surely ironic that, more than any other part of Western Europe, this country is at the mercy of the middle east. The correct description of any country whose Government's economic policies are determined by other Governments is to call it a colony. That is the role of Britain today. Our colonial past has become our colonial present with the roles reversed.

The price of oil is determined elsewhere and the Chancellor's Budget is entirely dependent on it. Dependent on it? The Government's policies are dominated by it. During the next few months, if the price of oil falls to $10 a barrel, the Chancellor tells us that the result for the Government will be disaster. If the price of oil rises to $20 we shall have a tax-cutting Budget on a massive scale next year—in the run-up to the general election. Of course, the tax cuts will be, and can only be, temporary, because the oil will eventually run out. What will happen then? The Chancellor gave his answer on Tuesday with characteristic sleight of hand:

> "If we can survive unscathed the loss of half of our North sea oil revenues in less than 25 weeks, the prospective loss of the other half over the remainder of the next 25 years should not cause us undue concern."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 168.]

The Chancellor forgets that there is a tremendous difference between loss of revenue due to the fall in the price of oil and the inevitable loss of revenue when the oil runs out. The Chancellor himself pointed out that, although lower prices for oil result in lower revenue for the Government, it also means lower costs to British industry. British industry benefits not only in terms of lower inflation but in terms of jobs. It also benefits, we hope, from the boost in world trade arising from universally lower prices for oil.

What will happen when the oil runs out and we lose the rest of the revenue? That will not have beneficial side effects for British industry. There will not be any reduction in costs because industry will still be paying the international price for oil. There will be no benefits in terms of lower costs, lower inflation and extra jobs.

Every economist knows — I am sure that the Chancellor must know — that his comparison of the effect of lower oil prices and the exhaustion of North sea oil was ingenious but invalid. I envisage a standard question in examinations on economics asking "Comment on the following statement—" after which will follow that classic quotation from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who will then be a former Chancellor of the Exchequer. Anybody how goes along with him will fail the exam as surely as the Chancellor is failing the country.

We also have the Chancellor's equally skilful, but equally misleading, approach to indirect taxes. Anybody who listened to the Chancellor's statement would have thought that he was putting all of the increases on cigarettes and petrol and leaving all other indirect taxes at the same level. He referred to the vehicle excise duty for cars, vans, and lorries but he forgot to tell us — he refrained from telling us—that only those rates, not all rates of vehicle excise duty, were unchanged.

We had to wait for a press release from the Department of Transport to learn that the Chancellor was increasing the vehicle excise duty on all forms of public transport. Even the Department of Transport took care to tell the editors of newspapers that it was the Chancellor's decision, not its decision, although he had left it to the Department of Transport to make the announcement.

There is no logic about the decision. Those of us who served on the Standing Committee which examined last year's Finance Bill remember that there was no logic or economic justification for the existing pattern of vehicle excise duties. The Government even brought the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport to the Committee in an attempt to explain the Government's thinking to us. From what I heard afterwards, Labour members of the Committee were not alone in concluding that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State made a bad job of explaining the Government's thinking because the Government had not done any thinking about vehicle excise duty. It is clear from this year's Budget statement that the Chancellor has not given any thought to the level or pattern of vehicle excise duties during the past 12 months either. So much for his claim of wanting to be known as a reforming Chancellor.

The Chancellor's attitude to petrol tax is even more revealing. As he said, petrol prices have drifted down recently as a result of falling oil prices, but the price of petrol has not dropped as much as it should. By the Chancellor's own admission, the price of petrol should have been 12p a gallon lower than it was on Budget day. What was the Chancellor's response? Did he see his role as the protector of consumers? Did he put any pressure on oil companies to pass on the reduction to the motorist? Did he announce that, although the price of petrol was due to drop by another 12p, he would regretfully have to increase the price by 5·5p to protect the Government's revenue against inflation? The answer is no on all counts. Instead, the Chancellor proposed what was effectively a deal with the oil companies. He said that the oil companies could keep 4·5p of that 12p if only they would let him have the rest—the 7·5p—without putting up the price at the pump, as he put it. He hoped that nobody would notice and that at least the motorist would not mind. It was a typical piece of ingenuity. The price of petrol should have come down, and it should still come down after allowing for the Chancellor's 7·5p, but the Chancellor was offering to keep quiet about it if only the oil companies would deal him in. The Chancellor's attitude to the oil companies is like the attitude of a policemen running a protection racket—offering to keep quiet if he gets his cut.

We also have the ingenuity of the Chancellor's policies to encourage share ownership, especially the personal equity plan. As my hon. friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) explained to the House, if the Chancellor was really trying to encourage new investors, he would restrict the tax benefits of the new scheme to that group. The truth is that the personal equity plan is a device to enable existing investors to avoid the tax on existing investment by switching their funds from their existing portfolios to the personal equity plan. The Chancellor shakes his head. If I am wrong, I am sure that he will explain later, and we shall look carefully at the Finance Bill for that provision. If people are able to switch their funds in that way, they will benefit disproportionately more than the new investor, by obtaining relief on dividends at the highest rates of tax as well as relief from capital gains tax.

This is the Chancellor who claims to want to help the small saver and the small investor. He even referred to his scheme as being designed specifically to encourage the smaller savers. Yet this is the same Chancellor who introduced a new tax on the savings of the smallest savers, the Chancellor whose 1984 Budget imposed tax on the interest received by people whose income was, and is, so low that they would not otherwise pay any income tax. These are the people who typically put their savings in the trustee savings bank or similar institutions and find that when they receive interest on their savings the Chancellor has been there before them and taken his cut of 25 per cent. with all the skill of a pickpocket.

That is not all. There is the same inconsistency in the Chancellor's treatment of other savers—people with incomes above average, who are liable to income tax on their investment incomes. This is the Chancellor who, only two years ago, as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West has just reminded us, turned the phrase "fiscal neutrality" into a cliché. This is the Chancellor who said that there should not be any difference in treatment of the income that investors and savers receive from different sources. He said that the institutions should compete on equal tax terms. That was the intellectual justification for the composite rate of tax on the interest paid by the trustee savings bank and similar institutions.

What price fiscal neutrality now? Where is the fiscal neutrality in charging tax on all interest received by savers and relieving income tax on dividends received by the same people if they put money into a personal equity plan rather than a trustee savings bank? No doubt the Chancellor will tell us later.

The one genuine tax concession for the individual taxpayer is the 1p off income tax. The arguments for and against this concession have all been rehearsed during our debates, and we all agree that it illustrates the differences between us. The Conservative party gives, and has always given, the greatest priority to tax cuts, by which it means cuts in the taxes on wealth and income, whereas the Labour party gives greater priority to an increase in public expenditure in order to extend and improve social services in the widest sense, to alleviate poverty in all its forms and above all to create jobs and reduce unemployment.

A Labour Government with £1 billion to spare would have used it differently. For example, to reduce the amount of income tax paid by people on low income, we would have preferred to raise the threshold for the basic rate of tax. To reduce the amount taken from people with the lowest wages, we would have preferred to raise the threshold for national insurance contributions. To have given the greatest help to people in greatest poverty, we would have preferred to increase pensions and child benefit.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) explained last week, such measures would cost much more than £1 billion. We calculate that it would cost £3 billion to increase pensions and child benefit and extend the long-term rate for supplementary benefit to the long-term unemployed. We would get that money, not at the expense of the man and woman paying the standard rate of income tax, but by increasing the taxes paid by the richest 5 per cent. of society.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Will the hon. Gentleman be voting against the cut in income tax?

Mr. Davis: I saw the hon. Gentleman receive that message from the Chancellor of the Exchequer a few moments ago via the Chancellor's PPS. We all know where the question came from, but I shall answer the Chancellor's question. We shall not be voting against the reduction in the standard rate of income tax. It would be strange if the Labour party voted against a reduction of 1p on the way towards a standard rate of income tax that existed when we left office. It was 25p, and is now 30p, so why should we vote against a slip back towards 25p? Anyway, we have made it clear that a cut in the standard rate of income tax will be of some benefit to those on the lowest wages who pay income tax. We do not deny that. It will provide a small amount. We are not going to set off the basic rate taxpayer against pensioners, parents and the long-term unemployed. We will get that money from the Chancellor's friends, the richest 5 per cent. of our society, those who have gained £3 billion a year. This Government have given that money to the rich not just in this Budget, but in all of their Budgets. That money has been given away in cuts not in the standard rate of income tax, but in the higher rates of income tax. It has been given away in the abolition of the investment income surcharge and in cuts in capital gains tax. It has also been given away in cuts in capital transfer tax and now in the abolition of that tax. I have mentioned only the four biggest giveaways. That money has been given not to those on the lowest incomes who are in greatest need, but to those on the highest incomes with the least need.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): Is the top rate of our income tax in line with the income tax rates paid in the EEC?

Mr. Davis: The hon. Gentleman has not been listening. I specifically referred not just to the higher rates of income tax but to the capital taxes. Those taxes have been cut and now abolished by this Government. That is the answer to Tory spokesmen such as the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who has just drawn himself to my attention. The right hon. Gentleman claimed that the Labour party's programme would be financed only by increasing the standard rate of income tax or by increasing VAT. But I shall not take any lessons from the chairman of a party that nearly doubled VAT within six weeks of coming to office.

I think that the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) today made his first speech since returning to the House. On a personal level, we are all glad that he has returned. There is no Conservative Member who feels more strongly than my hon. Friends and I feel about the reasons for his temporary absence.

Mr. Tebbit: May I assume that Opposition Members will be voting in favour of the prevention of terrorism legislation next time?

Mr. Davis: I must also tell the right hon. Member for Chingford that on a political level his absence has not led us to regard him more fondly.

But our real quarrel with Conservative spokesmen is that they constantly refuse to acknowledge that the most valuable, expensive and far-reaching tax concessions introduced by the Conservative Government have been reductions in the tax paid by people with large amounts of capital and people with substantial incomes derived from that capital. Those are the people who have benefited most from the Government's tax cuts, and it is they who will pay more to finance the Labour Government's anti-poverty programme. That programme will involve at present an increase of £3 a week in child benefit for every child; an increase of £5 a week in real terms in the pension for a single person; an increase of £8 a week in the pension for a married couple; and the extension of the long-term rate of supplementary benefit to the long-term unemployed.

The biggest failure of this Government is their failure to reduce unemployment and all the Chancellor's cleverness and skill and ingenuity cannot hide that failure from the British people. Of course we welcome an extra £100 million for job creation schemes, but such a sum is totally inadequate when compared to what is needed. That is why my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook announced a package of measures with the aim of providing a million new jobs within two years.

I come to the question put to me by the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) who quoted directly from Hansard of 19 March 1986. He quoted the question put by the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) at column 309. It is a pity that the hon. Member for Eastbourne did not listen carefully to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook, or at least did not read on in Hansard. If he had read on to the next column he would have seen the answer to the question. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Eastbourne was absent from our proceedings when the question was answered, but he could have read it before he made his intervention.

That package announced by my right hon. Friend will add up to £6·8 billion, not the £24 billion proclaimed by the Chief Secretary.

This debate has been overshadowed by the Chief Secretary's claim to have costed the Labour programme at £24 billion, a claim echoed by the right hon. Member for Chingford. That total has been shown to be a fiction. It was calculated by civil servants acting as animated calculating machines and dutifully totting up the cost for a mixture of plans for immediate implementation, long-term commitments and Green Paper type proposals on which the Labour party is consulting.

It is quite clear from the records that the Chief Secretary had the nerve to send to us that it was a mixture collected, confused and even invented by the Chief Secretary. Worse still, even where the Chief Secretary is right in his claims and his costings, he fails to understand — and many would say that he does not want to understand — that any increase in public expenditure on housing, roads, education, the Health Service or on a community programme or on training for the unemployed, would also have the effect of reducing all those items of public expenditure that result from unemployment.

We have made the point before and I will make it again. The top priority of the next Labour Government will be a reduction in unemployment. That is why we will increase public expenditure. It will be done to reduce unemployment, but the creation of new jobs will not only do that: it will also reduce the cost of unemployment. It costs £6,000 a year for every person who is unemployed, and for every person helped to get back to work the Government will save £6,000. That money is now spent on unemployment, and it will become available for education and the arts and a better standard of living for all those people, from pensioners to students, who depend on the Government for their standard of living. That is not an increase in public expenditure: it is a redistribution of public expenditure and resources.

I do not expect the Chief Secretary to understand that because he does not understand the economy any more than the Chancellor understands industry. Look at them: a financial journalist and a merchant banker supported by an investment banker and another hon. Gentleman who simply calls himself "banker." None of them has ever been unemployed or has ever worked in industry. The only thing that has ever dirtied their hands is their own economic policy. They do not care about industry or unemployment or poverty. That is why they have produced a Budget that is irrelevant to the needs of the country, and that is why the Labour party opposes it.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): The one thing of which we are always sure when the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) winds up a debate is entertainment. What he says bears little relationship to the facts, but at least we get the entertainment. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for not failing us this evening. He began his speech by saying that Britain was at the mercy of the middle east. The one thing that this Budget and the events that surrounded its conception has shown is, first, that events in the oil market have occurred not as a result of political actions by Governments in the middle east, but as a result of market forces asserting themselves against the political wishes of those in the middle east. Secondly, the events surrounding the Budget's conception have shown that our economic performance is in no way dependent on North sea oil. North sea oil is an important but marginal issue.

I should like to turn the point on which the hon. Member for Hodge Hill ended — the £24 billion programme which, as my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has rightly pointed out, is the sum to which the Labour party's commitments add up. [Interruption.] There is no point in the hon. Member for Hodge Hill muttering from a sedentary position that that is not true. During these debates, Labour Members announced not only the £3·6 billion programme for the relief of poverty but, on top of that, a £6·8 billion programme for jobs. We have been told that everything else is merely Green Paper conjecture for consultation. Is that really the case? Is the £1·3 billion, which the Labour party has said it will spend on education in various forms, merely a Green Paper type figure for consultation, or is it serious?

Mr. Terry Davis rose——

Mr. Lawson: I shall give way in a moment. Is the £0·8 billion——

Mr. Davis: Will the right hon. Gentleman let me answer?

Mr. Lawson: In a moment. Is the £0·8 billion, which the Labour party has said is the extra amount it will spend on the Health Service, merely a Green Paper type speculation? Is the Labour party now resiling from the £1·1 billion extra which the Leader of the Opposition said would be spent on overseas aid? Is the Labour party now resiling from the extra £1 billion which the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said was for additional spending on industry? Which of those programmes is a commitment and from which does the Labour party resile?

Mr. Davis: If the Chancellor had sat through more of our debates he would have heard the truth about our promises on the education programme. He knows that the figures were invented by the Chief Secretary. There is a four letter word to describe that, which is not parliamentary language.

Mr. Lawson: On the contrary, the figure that I have cited has been amended as a result of the letter from the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). Will the hon. Member for Hodge Hill say whether the Labour party resiles from the figures on health, education, overseas aid and aid to industry?

Mr. Davis: The Chief Secretary invented pledges, costed them wrongly and refused to retract. Any other hon. Member would have apologised to the House. We now know that the figures really came from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chief Secretary was merely his parrot.

Mr. Lawson: It is clear that the hon. Gentleman, speaking on behalf of the Opposition, has not resiled from those figures and that, therefore, the £24 billion still stands.

How will the Labour party pay for all those programmes? For a Chancellor of the Exchequer, when faced with questions of this kind——

Mr. Hoyle: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When will the Chancellor reply to the debate?

Mr. Speaker: The Chancellor has been speaking for about five minutes.

Mr. Lawson: I had no intention of going into these waters until these matters were raised by the hon. Member for Hodge Hill. I have to reply to his remarks.

How will the Labour party pay for all these programmes? When a Chancellor of the Exchequer has to be interrogated, he goes to the Select Committee on Treasury and Civil Service, and he is investigated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and other hon. Members. For a shadow spokesman on economic affairs, the equivalent of the Treasury and Civil Service Committee is Jimmy Young. Therefore, it is right that I should look to the transcript of the very important interview that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook gave on the Jimmy Young programme on 20 March. This is very important, and the House ought to pay attention.

Mr. Young said:

"Can I just ask you, I mean would what you get from the rich cover all the things that you want to do?"

The right hon. Gentleman said:

"It would more than cover it. Not the job programme, not the job programme. It would cover the pensions, the child benefit and the help to the long term unemployed. The very rich have got back about £3·64 billion and our anti-poverty programme, increasing the pension and so on, would cost about £3·5 billion."

Mr. Young said:

"Can I just ask you; when you say rich, Roy, you mean who's rich? I mean what income are you talking about?"

The right hon. Gentleman said:

"It's people earning more than £25,000 a year . . . I don't think we should begrudge people their very high earnings, we just ought to face the fact that if you don't tax them properly, there are penalties."

Mr. Young asked:

"Can I just get that one out of the way: when you say tax them properly, what sort of level would they be paying tax then, people on £25,000 a year?"

The right hon. Gentleman replied:

"The general income tax level wouldn't change very much, because our complaint is not about income tax, which ought not to return to what it was 10 years ago—98 per cent. on the marginal pound. I don't want income tax ever to get back to that level for £30,000, £40,000, £50,000."

Mr. Young then asked:

"You wouldn't want it to get past what sort of level?"

The right hon. Gentleman replied:

"I wouldn't want to change income tax very much. What I would want to do is remove some of the other tax perks that they've been given; capital gains tax, capital transfer tax and particularly the tax on unearned income."

Let us look at that. There would be no change in income tax at all, or at least not very much, but changes in capital gains tax and capital transfer tax. Let us see what that adds up to. [Interruption.] The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook was able to make his speech in relative quiet. I hope that the same courtesy will be extended to me.

The reductions in CGT and CTT under the present Government have added up to £620 million. On top of that, the abolition of the investment income surcharge—much of which went to people on the standard rate, not just to the wealthy—amounted to £740 million. So the total is £1·36 billion, or, even generously, only £1½ billion. I doubt very much, too, whether the right hon. Gentleman would be able to get that £1½ billion, because, as a result of the changes that we have made and the more benign climate for investment in this country, the yield on capital taxes since we have been in office has risen in real terms by more than 20 per cent. despite those reductions. Nevertheless, with that £1½ billion, the right hon. Gentleman would still be £2 billion short of his £3½ billion. Where would he find it? If he confined himself to those earning over £25,000, he would have to tax every single penny above £25,000 at 75 per cent. compared with the present starting point of 45 per cent. For the right hon. Gentleman to say that he would not change income tax very much is sheer humbug and hypocrisy, and he should know that that is not the case.

Furthermore, during the period that this Government have been in office, as a result of the benign climate that has been created, the share of total income tax paid by the top 5 per cent. has not fallen. It has risen from 24 per cent. of the total in 1978-79 to 27 per cent. of the total in the coming year. So much for the arithmetic of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook.

The speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East was one of the poorest speeches that he has made in this House for some considerable time. He claimed that manufacturing output stagnated in 1985. Manufacturing output rose in 1985 by 3 per cent., which was more than in any single year of the last Labour Government.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) made a more substantial speech. I thank him for his support for the Budget. He and the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) expressed opposing views about the desirability of joining the European monetary system. That is clearly an important issue, but I am afraid that I do not have time to go into the details of it tonight. However, I assure the House that we shall continue to keep it under close review.

The right hon. Member for South Down asked about the consequences that I expect to flow from the improvement in industry's success in the markets, both at home and overseas. One answer is more jobs, and I am sure that he will welcome that. However, I suspect that he was referring to the balance of payments. Another answer would be to offset the declining surplus in oil which is likely to occur on the overseas account.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) also supported the Budget. He queried to some extent the preference for the basic rate over thresholds. In this Parliament alone we have moved very substantially on tax thresholds. We have increased tax thresholds in real terms by more than 20 per cent. Most of that increase has been during the lifetime of this Parliament. Our thresholds are higher, as a proportion of average earnings, than those in Germany and the United States, whereas the starting point of our basic rate is higher than in almost any other country in the world. It is right that we should seek to bring it down, and I make no apology for saying that the long term aim of this Government is to get it down to 25 per cent.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) spoke, in particular, about inner city deprivation. If there is one culprit responsible for the acute problem of inner city deprivation, it is the public sector and the way in which local authorities have continually harassed businesses. It was necessary to create the urban development corporations, to which my right hon. Friend referred, in order to take power out of the hands of the local authorities in those areas.

On the whole, this Budget has been well received by the financial markets, as a result of which we have seen already a reduction of 1 per cent. in interest rates and a reduction in the mortgage rate. It has also been well received by industry, and not least by charities. I should like to say a word about charities. Some of the most important elements in the Budget were the measures that were introduced to encourage giving to charities and the charities themselves. I refer to the basic concession for corporate giving, the brand new concession for payroll giving by employees, the removal of the ceiling of £10,000 on covenants and the selection of value added tax reliefs. Certain abuses were also stopped. The Institute of Charity Fund-Raising Managers had this to say — [Interruption.] I am sorry that Opposition Members have no interest whatever in charitable giving. It is characteristic of them.

Mr. Bell: The reason why the Opposition have taken no interest in the subject until now is that the Chancellor has not alluded to the Budget. He has only now come to the Budget. We shall listen to him with interest.

Mr. Lawson: It is clear that the hon. Gentleman has not been listening. I am talking about an important section of the Budget at this moment — the concessions to charities. The Institute of Charity Fund-Raising Managers has said:

"This is the most exciting and imaginative Budget for charities there has ever been."

The Charities Aid Foundation said it was "more radical and far-reaching than we could have hoped for."

The noble Lord Goodman, on behalf of charities concerned with the arts, said there was the "prospect of many good things to come, and come soon."

The Charities VAT Reform Group said the Budget had the "most substantial concessions ever." Mr. Brian Rix of MENCAP said he was "amazed and delighted" by the concessions.

The Budget reflects and seeks to promote the sort of society we wish to see. This is an exemplification of capitalism in the true sense—the voluntary aid secured from higher profits and higher incomes. It is popular capitalism, too. That has been the theme of the Government and of the Budget.

The Government believe in a society in which people own a stake in their own country and in its means of wealth creation. We are engaged in closing the divide between them and us. That is the true route to one nation. It began many years ago with the property owning democracy in terms of home ownership. That has been greatly extended under this Government as a result of the enfranchisement of council tenants. It has been further extended through employee share ownership.

When we came into office in 1979 there were merely 30 all-employee share schemes in operation under the Finance Act 1978. Through improvements of that Act and through the Finance Act 1980, enacted by my predecessor, we have today not 30 schemes, but well over 1,000 schemes, involving 1¼ million employees in all-employee share schemes. There are now 1,375 share option schemes in operation, and that scheme only started in 1984.

[Mr. Lawson]

There are also workers' co-operatives — [Interruption.] I think that Labour Members are interested in worker co-operatives. When we took office the number of worker co-operatives in this country was 300. Today there are more than 1,200. [Interruption.] The Opposition may cheer, but when they were in office they merely talked about worker co-operatives. They never did anything about them.

The way in which we have pursued privatisation by giving preferential applications to small shareholders has more than doubled the number of individual shareholders in this country. Notably, of course, there is the British Telecom privatisation, which still has 1·6 million individual shareholders, many of them men and women who have never held a share before in their lives. That has opened up new horizons for more and more of our people.

Those horizons will be extended further by the personal equity plans announced in the Budget, which will come into force on 1 January after a period of consultation. Over time I believe that the new personal equity plans, which provide the possibility of investing small sums in equities year in, year out, totally free of all tax—tax on the dividends and on capital gains—will profoundly change the nature of our society. The people's capitalism is on the march, and there will be no stopping it. It will further foster the spirit of enterprise upon which economic success depends. [Interruption.] Opposition Members find it difficult to accept the fact that the British economy is doing very well.

We have a very important anniversary this year. It is the 10th anniversary of the flight from Manila in 1976. Unlike President Marcos, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) had to flee from Manila before he had even reached it. He got only as far as London airport when he had to turn back. That was at a time when inflation was running at 26 per cent. The exchange rate had fallen by one quarter over the previous three years. This country's net overseas assets are now some £90 billion. At that time, they had fallen to £3 billion. The public sector borrowing requirement, which the right hon. Gentleman regarded in such a cavalier manner, was almost 10 per cent. of gross domestic product. In today's money, that is £33 billion. That is precisely what he would like to see again. The result was collapse, ignominy and going cap in hand to the International Monetary Fund, and the then Labour Government had to have an about turn of their policies.

Let us contrast the situation today. Inflation is at 5 per cent., which is the average since the last election, and we are heading for 3·5 per cent. by the end of this year. We have a growth rate of 3 per cent. We have had 3 per cent. a year steadily since the last general election — [Interruption.] Yes, since the general election in 1983 it has been steadily 3 per cent. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East does not even know when the last general election was. I am not surprised. He had to obliterate it from his mind because his party was practically obliterated, too. Our growth rate is 3 per cent., and the prospect is the best for a generation. Indeed, in international competitiveness since 1979——

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lawson: I do not have the time.

Mr. Faulds rose——

Mr. Lawson: All right. I shall give way in a moment.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East invited me to make a comparison with 1979. I shall do so. Since 1979, we have grown to the same extent as France and Germany, whereas under the Labour Government we grew very much less. Indeed, in no other six-year period since the war has our relative performance compared with our European competitors been as good as it has been since 1979.

Mr. Faulds: Will the right hon. Gentleman be charitable enough to his private office to admit that he wrote this rubbish?

Mr. Lawson: I am sorry that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman.

Our cumulative surplus on the balance of payments has been more than £20 billion over that period.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East spent a great deal of time talking about manufacturing industry. It is right that I should reply. To do him credit, I think that he has been talking about it for a little while. The Leader of the Opposition speaks with the excessive enthusiasm of someone who has only just discovered its very existence.

The plain fact is that the environment for manufacturing today is better than it has been for a very long time. We have lower oil prices. The reduction in the fuel bill so far is worth over £1 billion to manufacturing industry. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, Labour Members want to take that away. Despite their professed concern for manufacturing industry, they are recommending that we should enter into talks with the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries to ensure that the oil price is higher than it is now. That is what was said by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) on behalf of the Opposition. I hope that Labour Members will tell manufacturing industry how much higher they would like oil prices to be — [Interruption.] We have a lower exchange rate against both Germany and Japan, our principal competitors, and, of course, lower inflation. That does not normally happen when the exchange rate is coming down. Inflation is also coming down sharply. This is an unparalleled opportunity for British industry in general and for manufacturing industry in particular, at a time when we are holding our share of world markets. Between 1981 and 1985 inclusive we have seen the best five-year period in recent history for maintaining our share of world markets.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lawson: I shall not give way. I have given way a great deal.

Although there has been some decline since 1979 in the share of world trade in manufacturing, our share of world trade has declined very much less than that of France and Germany since 1979. Manufacturing profitability is the highest since 1973. It is from that manufacturing profitability that the resources come for more spending on training and research and development. Of course, I welcome the emphasis that was laid on that, echoing what I said in my Budget speech. Under the Labour Government, the profits were not there and industry was unable to make that expenditure. Now that the opportunity is there, I hope that industry will take it. As to unemployment—

Dr. M. S. Miller: Will the Chancellor answer a question which is puzzling the nation? If things are so good, why are things so bad?

Mr. Lawson: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to unemployment, which, of course, is bad. We have never sought to disguise the fact that unemployment is bad. It is odd that the Opposition seek to deny what is good in terms of productivity, output, inflation, profitability, overall investment and exports. All these are good. Over a number of years we have introduced special measures to help the unemployed. We announced more this year. In addition—

Mr. John Smith: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lawson: No.

In addition to that, a number of measures are specially designed to encourage small and new businesses which are particularly important for the future of employment. I refer to the improved loan guarantee scheme, the improvement in the business expansion scheme and the improvement on capital transfer tax. The most crippling burden on small and family businesses was capital transfer tax.

None of those measures will reduce unemployment in the way that hon. Members on both sides of the House would like, unless there is a slower growth in unit labour costs. Many of my hon. Friends rightly referred to that. There is no getting away from the fact that we shall not achieve the lower unemployment that we all seek unless unit labour costs rise at a slower rate than among our competitors. That is why, to encourage flexibility in the labour market, I made the profit sharing proposal in the Budget so that a proportion of remuneration related to company profits might receive a tax concession. I am encouraged by the early signs of a positive response. But that is in the long term. In the short term business must take control of its own labour costs. The only solution to unemployment is a more effective, efficient and dynamic economy.

The most favourable climate for industry is the most favourable climate for jobs. There is no way round achieving a better climate for jobs other than by achieving a better climate for industry.

Since the last general election we have seen inflation averaging 5 per cent. and growth averaging 3 per cent. —the best combination for a generation. We have seen manufacturing output average 4 per cent. growth a year, manufacturing productivity average 4¾ per cent. a year, employment rise at a rate of over 750,000 a year, non-oil exports grow at 4½ per cent. a year and real take-home pay at 2½ per cent. a year.

Not only has our position been better than under many previous Governments for a very long time, but, even if one takes the period from 1979, our relative position has improved considerably. We have not yet made as much progress with inflation as we should like, but we are making progress and I forecast that it will be 3½ per cent. by the end of this year. Since we have been in office, inflation has been 1 per cent. higher than the OECD average. But when the Labour party was in power inflation was 6 per cent. higher than the OECD average. That is another measure of the improvement in comparative terms as well as in absolute terms.

The Budget which I introduced on Tuesday is a Budget for the whole of the people. It is a Budget that will continue to build on the success of our previous Budgets. It is a Budget that will encourage the spread of wider share ownership and popular capitalism and I commend it to the House.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply;

(b) for refunding any amount of tax;

(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies and importations; or

(d) for any relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.

Mr. Speaker: I am now required under Standing Order No. 114 to put successively, without further debate, the Questions on each of the Ways and Means motions Nos. 2 to 41 and the motion of procedure, on all of which the Finance Bill is to be brought in. Instead of reading out all of the motions in full, I propose to follow the procedure used in recent years; that is to say, I shall first state the title of the motion and then put the Question that the motion be agreed to.

2. TOBACCO PRODUCTS

Resolved,

That, as from 21st March 1986, the rates of duty on cigarettes and hand-rolling tobacco specified in Schedule 1 to the Tobacco Products Duty Act 1979 shall be increased—

(a) in the case of cigarettes, to an amount equal to 21 per cent. of the retail price plus £30·61 per thousand cigarettes; and

(b) in the case of hand-rolling tobacco, to £49·64 per kilogram:

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

3. HYDROCARBON OIL

Question put,

That, as from 6 o'clock in the evening of 18th March 1986—

(1) the rates of duty specified in section 6(1) of the Hydrocarbon Oil Duties Act 1979 shall be increased—

(a) in the case of light oil, from £0·1794 a litre to £0·1938 a litre; and

(b) in the case of heavy oil, from £0·1515 a litre to £0·1639 a litre; and

(2) in subsection (1) of section 11 of that Act (rebate on heavy oil) for paragraphs (a) and (b) there shall be substituted—

"(a) in the case of fuel oil, of £0·0077 a litre less than the rate at which the duty is for the time being chargeable;

(b) in the case of gas oil, of £0·0110 a litre less than the rate at which the duty is for the time being chargeable; and

(c) in the case of heavy oil other than fuel oil and gas oil, equal to the rate at which the duty is for the time being chargeable"; and

(3) for subsection (2) of section 11 of that Act (definition of types of heavy oil) there shall be substituted—

"(2) In this section—

'fuel oil' means heavy oil which contains in solution an amount of asphaltenes of not less than 0·5 per cent. or which contains less than 0·5 per cent. but not less than 0·1 per cent. of asphaltenes and has a closed flash point not exceeding 150°C; and

'gas oil' means heavy oil of which not more than 50 per cent. by volume distils at a temperature not exceeding 240°C and of which more than 50 per cent. by volume distils at a temperature not exceeding 340°C";

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

4. VEHICLES EXCISE DUTY (HACKNEY CARRIAGES AND FARMERS' GOODS VEHICLES)

Resolved,

That the Vehicles (Excise) Act 1971 and the Vehicles (Excise) Act (Northern Ireland) 1972 shall have effect, in relation to licences taken out after 18th March 1986, with the amendments set out below:

But this Resolution shall not authorise the making of amendments which would result in different provisions being in force in different parts of Great Britain;

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

(1) For Part II of Schedule 2 to each of the Acts of 1971 and 1972 (annual rates of duty for hackney carriages) there shall be substituted the following—

PART II

Description of vehicle	Rate of duty
Hackney carriages	£ 52·50 with an additional £1·05 for each person above 20 (excluding the driver) for which the vehicle has seating capacity.

(2) In Schedule 4 to each of the Acts of 1971 and 1972 (annual rates of duty on goods vehicles)—

(a) in Part I, in sub-paragraph (2) of paragraph 6 (farmer's goods vehicle or showman's goods vehicle having a plated gross weight or a plated train weight) in paragraph (b) (weight exceeding 7·5 tonnes but not exceeding 12 tonnes) for "£135" (which applies to farmers' goods vehicles only) there shall be substituted "£155"; and

(b) in Part II, for Tables A(1), C(1) and D(1) (rates for farmers' goods vehicles having plated weight exceeding 12 tonnes) there shall be substituted the Tables set out below:

5. VEHICLES EXCISE DUTY (TRADE LICENCES)

Resolved,

That provision be made with respect to the rates of duty applicable to trade licences under section 16 of each of the Vehicles (Excise) Act 1971 and the Vehicles (Excise) Act (Northern Ireland) 1972.

6. ABOLITION OF CERTAIN EXCISE LICENCE DUTIES

Resolved,

That no excise licence duty shall be chargeable on the grant after 18th March 1986 of an excise licence under any provision of the Alcoholic Liquor Duties Act 1979 or under section 2 of the Matches and Mechanical Lighters Duties Act 1979:

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

7. GENERAL BETTING DUTY, POOL BETTING DUTY AND BINGO DUTY

Resolved,

That provision may be made extending to Northern Ireland the provisions of the Betting and Gaming Duties Act 1981 relating to general betting duty, pool betting duty and bingo duty.

8. CUSTOMS AND EXCISE DUTIES (WAREHOUSING)

Resolved,

That provision may be made with respect to the matters which may be dealt with in regulations under section 93 of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 (warehousing regulations).

9. VALUE ADDED TAX (REGISTRATION)

Resolved,

That for the purposes of the Value Added Tax Act 1983 provision may be made with respect to the registration of two or more persons as one taxable person.

10. VALUE ADDED TAX (ZERO-RATING)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for the imposition of conditions with respect to the zero-rating of supplies of goods by virtue of section 16(6) of the Value Added Tax Act 1983.

11. VALUE ADDED TAX (RELIEF ON IMPORTATION)

Resolved,

That provision may be made with respect to conditional relief from value added tax under section 19 of the Value Added Tax Act 1983.

12. VALUE ADDED TAX (PROVISION OF ACCOMMODATION)

Resolved,

That provision may be made with respect to the valuation for the purposes of value added tax of certain supplies of services consisting in the provision of accommodation.

13. INCOME TAX (CHARGE AND RATES FOR 1986-87)

Question put,

That—

(1) Income tax for the year 1986-87 shall be charged at the basic rate of 29 per cent. and, in respect of so much of an individual's total income as exceeds £17,200 (the basic rate limit as determined under subsection (4) of section 24 of the Finance Act 1980—indexation), at such higher rates as are specified in the Table below:

TABLE

Higher rate bands	Higher rate
The first £3,000...	40 per cent.
The next £5,200...	45 per cent.
The next £7,900...	50 per cent.
The next £7,900...	55 per cent.
The remainder	60 per cent.

(2) Section 24(4) of the Finance Act 1980 (indexation of thresholds) shall not, so far as it relates to the higher rate bands, apply for the year 1986-87:

(3) This Resolution shall not require any change to be made in the amounts deductable or repayable under section 204 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 (pay as you earn) before 18th May 1986:

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

Question accordingly agreed to.

14. INCOME TAX (INDEXED PERSONAL RELIEFS ETC.): OPERATIVE DATE FOR PAYE

Resolved,

That, for the year 1986-87, in subsection (7) of section 24 of the Finance Act 1980 (which specifies the date from which indexed changes in income tax thresholds and allowances are to be brought into account for the purposes of PAYE) for "5th May" there shall be substituted "18th May":

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

15. Relief for interest (limit for 1986-87)

Resolved,

That, for the year 1986-87, the qualifying maximum referred to in paragraphs 5(1) and 24(3) of Schedule 1 to the Finance Act 1974 (limit on relief for interest on certain loans for the purchase or improvement of land) shall be £30,000:

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968.

16. Advance corporation tax (rate for financial year 1986)

Resolved,

That the rate of advance corporation tax for the financial year 1986 shall be twenty-nine seventy-firsts.

17. Building societies

Resolved,

That provision may be made with respect to the treatment for the purposes of income tax and corporation tax of dividends and interest payable in respect of shares in or deposits with or loans to a building society.

18. Shares and rights to acquire shares obtained by directors and employees

Resolved,

That charges to income tax may be imposed by provisions amending section 186 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 (directors and employees granted rights to acquire shares) and section 79 of the Finance Act 1972 (share incentive schemes).

19. Occupational pension schemes

Resolved,

That provision may be made with respect to—

(a) payments to employers out of funds held for the purposes of occupational pension schemes; and

(b) exemptions and reliefs from tax under section 21 of the Finance Act 1970.

20. Enterprise allowance

Resolved,

That provision (including retrospective provision) may be made about enterprise allowance.

21. Business expansion scheme

Resolved,

That provision may be made amending Schedule 5 to the Finance Act 1983.

22. Company reconstructions

Resolved,

That provision may be made with respect to relief from tax where a company ceases to carry on a trade or part of a trade.

23. Loans to participators

Resolved,

That provision may be made with respect to tax chargeable under section 286 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970.

24. Charities

Resolved,

That provision may be made with respect to—

(a) exemption under section 360 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 (exemptions for charities from tax under Schedule A to F);

(b) charges to tax where assets are disposed of by charities; and

(c) covenanted payments to charities and payments by one charity to another.

25. Value added tax penalties etc. (income tax and corporation tax)

Resolved,

That charges to income tax and corporation tax may be imposed by provisions with respect to penalties, interest and surcharge under Chapter II of Part I of the Finance Act 1985 (value added tax).

26. Associated companies (oil and gas industry)

Resolved,

That provision may be made extending the cases in which two companies are associated with one another for the purposes of Part II of the Oil Taxation Act 1975.

27. Capital allowances (machinery and plant etc.)

Resolved,

That provision may be made with respect to allowances in respect of expenditure on the provision of machinery or plant for leasing and on the provision of certain vehicles.

Resolved,

That provision may be made with respect to allowances under Chapter III of Part I of the Capital Allowances Act 1968 (mines, oil wells etc.)

29. Dual resident trusts: capital gains tax

Resolved,

That provision may be made for denying or recovering relief under section 79 of the Finance Act 1980 (general relief for gifts) where the transferee is a body of trustees which is or becomes treated as resident both in the United Kingdom and elsewhere.

30. Securities (income tax, capital gains tax and corporation tax)

Resolved,

That charges to income tax, capital gains tax and corporation tax may be imposed by provisions about events occurring after 18th March 1986 in relation to securities.

31. Stamp duty (reconstructions etc.)

Resolved,

That the following provisions shall have effect for the period beginning 25th March 1986 and ending 31 days after the earliest of the dates mentioned in section 50(2) of the Finance Act 1973—

(1) In section 55 of the Finance Act 1927 and in section 4 of the Finance Act (Northern Ireland) 1928 (reconstructions and amalgamations) in paragraph (B) of subsection (1) for the words "not be chargeable" there shall be substituted the words "be chargeable at the rate mentioned in subsection (9) of this section" and for the words "nor shall any such duty be chargeable" there shall be substituted the word "or".

(2) In consequence, each of those sections shall be further amended as follows—

(a) at the beginning of paragraph (B) of subsection (1) there shall be inserted the words "If a claim is made under this section";

(b) in paragraph (a) of the proviso to subsection (1) the words from "either it" to "liable or" and from "either that" to "duty or" shall be omitted, and in paragraph (c) of that proviso the words "for exemption" shall be omitted;

(c) in subsection (2) for the words "for exemption under paragraph (B) of subsection (1) of" there shall be substituted the word "under";

(d) in subsection (5) the words "for exemption" shall be omitted;

(e) in subsection (6), in paragraph (a) the words "for expemption from duty" shall be omitted, in paragraph (c) for the word "exemption" there shall be substituted the word "claim", and in the words following paragraph (c) for the word "exemption" there shall be substituted the word "claim", for the word "remitted" (in the first place where it occurs) there shall be substituted the word "unpaid" and the words from "in the case of duty remitted under paragraph (A)" to "the said subsection" shall be omitted;

(f) in subsection (7) for the words "for exemption from duty under subsection (1) of" there shall be substituted the word "under", for the words "such exemption" there shall be substituted the words "such a claim to be allowed" and for the words "have been remitted" there shall be substituted the words "not have been chargeable".

(3) At the end of each of those sections there shall be inserted—

"(9) The rate is the rate of 50p for every £100 or part of £100 of the amount or value of the consideration for the sale to which the instrument gives effect."

(4) In paragraph 12 of Schedule 18 to the Finance Act 1980 (demergers) for sub-paragraph (1) there shall be substituted—

"(1) If a document executed solely for the purpose of effecting an exempt distribution is chargeable with stamp duty under the heading 'Conveyance or Transfer on Sale' in Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act 1891, the rate at which the duty is charged under that heading shall be the rate of 50p for every £100 or part of £100 of the amount or value of the consideration for the sale to which the document gives effect.

(1A) If a document executed solely for the purpose of effecting an exempt distribution is chargeable with stamp duty under the heading "Conveyance or Transfer on Sale" in Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act 1891, it shall not be treated as duly stamped unless it is stamped in accordance with section 12 of the Stamp Act 1891 with a particular stamp denoting that it is duly stamped."

(5) In paragraph 12(3) of Schedule 18 to the Finance Act 1980 for the words "this paragraph" there shall be substituted the words "sub-paragraph (2) above".

(6) In section 78 of the Finance Act 1985 (takeovers) the following shall be substituted for subsection (2)—

"(2) If the instrument transferring the shares in company B by way of the exchange is chargeable with stamp duty under the heading 'Conveyance or Transfer on Sale' in Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act 1891, the rate at which the duty is charged under that heading shall be the rate of 50p for every £100 or part of £100 of the amount or value of the consideration for the sale to which the instrument gives effect."

(7) In section 79 of the Finance Act 1985 (voluntary winding-up: transfer of shares) the following shall be substituted for subsection (2)—

"(2) If the instrument transferring the shares in company B to company A is chargeable with stamp duty under the heading 'Conveyance or Transfer on Sale' in Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act 1891, the rate at which the duty is charged under that heading shall be the rate of 50p for every £100 or part of £100 of the amount or value of the consideration for the sale to which the instrument gives effect."

(8) In section 78 and in section 79 of the Finance Act 1985—

(a) in subsection (3) for the word "ignored" there shall be substituted the words "treated as reduced by 50 per cent.";

(b) subsection (9) shall be omitted;

(c) in subsection (10) for "(3)" there shall be substituted "(2) or (3)".

(9) This Resolution applies to any instrument which is executed after 24th March 1986 unless—

(a) it is executed in pursuance of an unconditional contract made on or before 18th March 1986, or

(b) it transfers stock or marketable securities and is executed in pursuance of a general offer (for the stock or securities) which became unconditional as to acceptances on or before 18th March 1986.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of section 50 of the Finance Act 1973.

32. STAMP DUTY (ACQUISITIONS)

Resolved,

That the following provisions shall have effect for the period beginning 25th March 1986 and ending 31 days after the earliest of the dates mentioned in section 50(2) of the Finance Act 1973—

(1) This Resolution applies where a company (the acquiring company) acquires the whole or part of an undertaking of another company (the target company) in pursuance of a scheme for the reconstruction of the target company.

(2) If the first and second conditions (as defined below) are fulfilled, stamp duty under the heading "Conveyance or Transfer on Sale" in Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act 1891 shall not be chargeable on an instrument executed for the purposes of or in connection with the transfer of the undertaking or part.

(3) An instrument on which stamp duty is not chargeable by virtue only of paragraph (2) above shall not be taken to be duly stamped unless it is stamped with the duty to which it would be liable but for that paragraph or it has, in accordance with section 12 of the Stamp Act 1891, been stamped with a particular stamp denoting that it is not chargeable with any duty.

(4) The first condition is that the registered office of the acquiring company is in the United Kingdom and that the consideration for the acquisition—

(a) consists of or includes the issue of shares in the acquiring company to all the shareholders of the target company;

(b) includes nothing else (if anything) but the assumption or discharge by the acquiring company of liabilities of the target company.

(5) The second condition is that—

(a) the acquisition is effected for bona fide commercial reasons and does not form part of a scheme or arrangement of which the main purpose, or one of the main purposes, is avoidance of liability to stamp duty, income tax, corporation tax or capital gains tax,

(b) after the acquisition has been made, each shareholder of each of the companies is a shareholder of the other, and

(c) after the acquisition has been made, the proportion of shares of one of the companies held by any shareholder is the same as the proportion of shares of the other company held by that shareholder.

(6) This Resolution applies to any instrument which is executed after 24th March 1986 unless it is executed in pursuance of an unconditional contract made on or before 18th March 1986.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of section 50 of the Finance Act 1973.

33. STAMP DUTY (LOAN CAPITAL)

Resolved,

That the following provisions shall have effect for the period beginning 25th March 1986 and ending 31 days after the earliest of the dates mentioned in section 50(2) of the Finance Act 1973—

(1) The following provisions shall cease to have effect—

(a) in section 62 of the Finance Act 1963, subsections (2) and (6) (commonwealth stock);

(b) in section 11 of the Finance Act (Northern Ireland) 1963, subsections (2) and (5) (commonwealth stock);

(c) section 29 of the Finance Act 1967 (local authority capital);

(d) section 6 of the Finance Act (Northern Ireland) 1967 (local authority capital);

(e) section 126 of the Finance Act 1967 (loan capital).

(2) Stamp duty under the heading "Bearer Instrument" in Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act 1891 shall not be chargeable on the issue of an instrument which relates to loan capital or on the transfer of the loan capital constituted by or transferable by means of, such an instrument.

(3) Stamp duty shall not be chargeable on an instrument which transfers loan capital issued or raised by—

(a) the financial support fund of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development,

(b) the Inter-American Development Bank, or

(c) an organisation which was a designated international organisation at the time of the transfer (whether or not it was such an organisation at the time the loan capital was issued or raised).

(4) Stamp duty shall not be chargeable on an instrument which transfers short-term loan capital.

(5) Where stamp duty under the heading "Conveyance or Transfer on Sale" in Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act 1891 is chargeable on an instrument which transfers loan capital, the rate at which the duty is charged under that heading shall be the rate of 50p for every £100 or part of £100 of the amount or value of the consideration for the sale to which the instrument gives effect.

(6) In this Resolution "loan capital" means—

(a) any debenture stock, corporation stock or funded debt, by whatever name known, issued by a body corporate or other body of persons (which here includes a local authority and any body whether formed or established in the United Kingdom or elsewhere);

(b) any capital raised by such a body if the capital is borrowed or has the character of borrowed money, and whether it is in the form of stock or any other form;

(c) stock or marketable securities issued by the government of any country or territory outside the United Kingdom.

(7) In this Resolution "short-term loan capital" means loan capital the date (or latest date) for the repayment of which is not more than five years after the date on which it is issued or raised.

(8) In this Resolution "designated international organisation" means an international organisation designated for the purposes of section 126 of the Finance Act 1984 by an order made under subsection (1) of that section.

(9) In construing sections 80(3) and 81(3) of the Finance Act 1985 (definitions by reference to section 126 of the Finance Act 1976) the effect of this Resolution shall be ignored.

(10) This Resolution applies to any instrument which falls within section 60(1) of the Finance Act 1963 and is issued after 24th March 1986.

(11) This Resolution applies to any instrument which falls within section 60(2) of that Act if the loan capital constituted by or transferable by means of it is transferred after 24th March 1986.

(12) This Resolution applies, in the case of instruments not falling within section 60(1) or (2) of that Act, to any instrument which is executed after 24th March 1986, unless it is executed in pursuance of a contract made on or before 18th March 1986.

(13) In this Resolution references to section 60(1) of the Finance Act 1963 include references to section 9(1)(a) of the Finance Act (Northern Ireland) 1963 and references to section 60(2) of the former Act include references to section 9(1)(b) of the latter.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of section 50 of the Finance Act 1973.

34. STAMP DUTY (BEARER LETTERS OF ALLOTMENT ETC.)

Resolved,

That the following provisions shall have effect for the period beginning 25th March 1986 and ending 31 days after the earliest of the dates mentioned in section 50(2) of the Finance Act 1973—

(1) In Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act 1891, in the heading "Bearer Instrument", paragraph 2 of the exemptions (bearer letter of allotment etc. required to be surrendered not later than six months after issue) shall be omitted.

(2) This Resolution applies to any instrument which falls within section 60(1) of the Finance Act 1963 and is issued after 24th March 1986, unless it is issued by a company in pursuance of a general offer for its shares and the offer became unconditional as to acceptances on or before 18th March 1986.

(3) This Resolution applies to any instrument which falls within section 60(2) of that Act if the stock constituted by or transferable by means of it is transferred after 24th March 1986.

(4) In this Resolution the reference to section 60(1) of the Finance Act 1963 includes a reference to section 9(1)(a) of the Finance Act (Northern Ireland) 1963 and the reference to section 60(2) of the former Act includes a reference to section 9(1)(b) of the latter.

And it is hereby declared that it is expedient in the public interest that this Resolution should have statutory effect under the provisions of section 50 of the Finance Act 1973.

35. STAMP DUTY (LETTERS OF ALLOTMENT)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for restricting the exemption from stamp duty provided by section 65(1) of the Finance Act 1963 and section 14(1) of the Finance Act (Northern Ireland) 1963.

36. STAMP DUTY (COMPANY'S PURCHASE OF OWN SHARES)

Resolved,

That provision may be made for charging stamp duty on returns delivered under section 169 of the Companies Act 1985 or Article 53 of the Companies (Northern Ireland) Order 1982.

37. STAMP DUTY RESERVE TAX

Resolved,

That a tax shall be charged in respect of events occurring after 18th march 1986 in relation to securities.

38. TAX UNDER CAPITAL TRANSFER TAX ACT 1984

Question put,

That charges to tax under the Capital Transfer Tax Act 1984 may be imposed—

(a) by provisions relating to deaths occurring on or after 18th March 1986;

(b) by provisions removing relief referable to mutual transfers where at least one of the transfers occurs on or after that date; and

(c) by provisions relating to relief under Chapter I (business property) or Chapter II (agricultural property) of Part V of that Act in the case of transfers of value on or after that date.

Question accordingly agreed to.

39. Oil Taxation: Light Gases

Resolved,

That, for the purpose of petroleum revenue tax, provision may be made with respect to the valuation of light gases.

40. Oil Taxation: Attribution of Chargeable Receipts and Allowable Expenditure

Resolved,

That, in any case where—

(a) tariff receipts or disposal receipts arising in a chargeable period ending after 30th June 1982, or

(b) allowable expenditure, within the meaning of Part II of Schedule 1 to the Oil Taxation Act 1983, fall to be (or have at any time since the passing of the said Act of 1983 fallen to be) attributed to one of two or more oil fields and development decisions relating to those fields were first made on the same day, provision may be made for determining which of those decisions is to be presumed to have been made first.

41. Relief from Tax (Incidental and Consequential Charges)

Resolved

That it is expedient to authorise any incidental or consequential charges to any duty or tax (including charges having retrospective effect) which may arise from provisions designed in general to afford relief from tax.

Procedure (Future Taxation)

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to matters which may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may contain provision taking effect in a future year with respect to—

(a) the treatment for the purposes of value added tax of fuel which is or is to be provided or appropriated by a taxable person for private use in a motor vehicle;

(b) relief from investment in corporate trades; and

(c) relief in respect of payments to charities.

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the foregoing resolutions by the Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Walker, Mr. Secretary Fowler, Mr. Secretary Ridley, Mr. Secretary Baker, Mr. Kenneth Clarke, Mr. John MacGregor, Mr. Secretary Channon Mr. John Moore, Mr. Ian Stewart and Mr. Peter Brooke.

Finance

Bill to grant certain duties, to alter other duties and to amend the law relating to the National Debt and the Public Revenue, and to make further provision in connection with finance, presented accordingly by Mr. John Moore and read the First time; to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 117.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the consideration of the Lords Amendment to the Museum of London Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Museum of London Bill

Lords amendment considered.

New Clause

REPORTS

Lords amendment: After clause 4, insert:

" . Not later than 31st March 1989 and subsequently at intervals not exceeding three years the Secretary of State shall lay before each House of Parliament a report on the exercise of the functions of the Board of Governors of the Museum of London since the commencement of this Act or, in the case of the second and subsequent reports, since the end of the period to which the previous report related."

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The moving of the new clause by the Government in another place fulfilled a commitment that I gave to the House on Report on 3 February. The object of the amendment is to ensure, by a statutory obligation, that regular reports on the Museum of London's activities are produced and laid before Parliament. The hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) will recall that I made it clear on 3 February that, were we to impose that statutory obligation on the museum itself, there would be an element of hybridity in the proceedings. For that reason, we moved a new clause in another place.

The Museum of London already produces regular reports and I have no doubt that it would continue to do so without a statutory obligation being placed upon it. However, persuasive arguments were put forward in the earlier stages that, because of the important accountability principle, there was a good case for enshrining the reporting commitment into a statutory obligation. The Government agree and so proposed the amendment.

I stress another matter about the wording. The new clause provides for reports to be produced not less frequently than every three years. I emphasise that there is no intention to change the practice of producing annual reports. The museum will continue to do that. As I explained in Committee, it would be an overtight imposition to require the museum by law to produce reports every year. The words follow the precedent for statutory reporting obligations on other major museums under the National Heritage Act 1983.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): On behalf of the Opposition I welcome one of the few changes that we have managed to secure. The new clause is helpful and I am grateful to the Minister for his clarification on the three years or one year reporting obligation.

I welcome the clause, but the Opposition do not welcome the Bill. We shall reverse its provisions when we return to power. In the meantime it will be convenient to have a report on the workings of the museum. I support the new clause.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for the new clause. The Opposition moved an amendment that there should be an annual report. I suggested that a three-year period would be wiser because of the charitable nature of the organisation and because of the practice among museums in general. Not only should one remember that the Museum of London already produces a report annually, but I am certain that if something is to be received from organisations outside local government, such as industry and, under the new Budget, from individuals who might find it more attractive to give money to such causes, reports are important because they can help to raise even more money through imformative presentation.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): My right hon. and hon. Friends welcome the proposal. In view of the Budget and the change in the personae of those who might contribute to the museum, I urge the Minister not to stray too far from an annual report. In a changing scene it is immensely helpful to accountability for a report not only to be there, but to be seen to be there.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): I dashed into the House in the hope of hearing the Minister, but I was just too late. The position as I understand it now seems satisfactory. There is to be an obligation to produce a report every three years, but that does not preclude an annual report, which has been of considerable value to those interested in the museum, and in museums generally. I join in the general accord for the proposal.

Question put and agreed to.

Coal Industry

11.4 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): I beg to move,

That the draft Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal (Payments Schemes) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 10 March, be approved.

I understand that it might be in order to take both orders together.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With the agreement of the House, we shall take both orders together.

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If we are taking both orders together, are we restricted to only 90 minutes' debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is so. The House has decided to take the two orders together which means a debate of 1½ hours on both orders, not three hours.

Mr. Hunt: When on 28 March 1985 I commended to the House the Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal (Payments Schemes) Amendment Order 1985 I warned that, although the long and damaging strike which the industry had suffered was over, its consequences would be with us for some considerable time. One important consequence was that many miners failed to pay sufficient national insurance contributions during the tax year 1984-85 to qualify for full contributions-based social security benefits on claims falling within the 1986 benefit year. The purpose of the present Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal (Payments Schemes) Order is both to provide for the continued operation of the schemes and to amend the existing terms to take account of this consequence.

The provisions of the scheme now being introduced were announced in outline by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy on 19 December 1985. They follow closely for full-time employees those of the present schemes which expire on 29 March, providing for essentially the same range of lump sum and weekly benefits; but they provide important additional protection for those older men whose redundancy date falls within the 1986 social security benefit year and who, for the reasons I have already mentioned, fail to qualify for full state unemployment benefit or sickness benefit.

As right hon. and hon. Members who take an interest in the operation of the redundancy scheme will know, to be entitled to weekly benefits under the present rules a man must, with certain limited exceptions, either satisfy the conditions for receipt of unemployment benefit, sickness benefit or invalidity pension or, with regard to unemployment benefit, satisfy those conditions but for entitlement to that benefit being exhausted. This rule, which has been part of the scheme since it was first introduced, was designed to ensure a proper integration of continuing weekly payments under the scheme with social security benefits.

In the present circumstances, however, it has an unfortunate consequence since it means that an older man whose redundancy falls within the 1986 social security benefit year and who lacks sufficient national insurance contributions to qualify for unemployment benefit or sickness benefit stands to lose the benefits for which he failed to make adequate contributions and his weekly benefits under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme.

The present order seeks to overcome this difficulty in articles 9 and 10. Article 10 provides that where such a man is unemployed or unavailable for work through sickness, provided he has an entitlement to credits on national insurance contributions he is not precluded from weekly benefits under the scheme even if he fails to satisfy the contribution conditions for entitlement to unemployment benefit or sickness benefit. That is, provided he meets essentially the same general requirement as before, other than the contribution requirement, he may receive weekly payments under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme. Article 9 then allows the Secretary of State to pay such a man additional scheme benefits as well, together with any unemployment benefit, sickness benefit, invalidity pension or severe disablement allowance to which he is entitled, equal the total amount of those benefits to which he would have been entitled but for the failure to satisfy the contribution conditions. In short, he may receive make-up payments under the redundant mineworkers payment scheme to make good his loss of social security benefits.

Clearly it would be inequitable if men who had failed to pay full national insurance contributions in 1984-85 and received these make-up payments were in consequence better off overall than those who did pay and would therefore satisfy the existing rules. For this reason, the order also provides, in article 18, for a reduction in the lump sum payable to men who receive topped-up weekly payments. It is not practicable for the amount of that reduction to equal for each man the precise figure which he might have paid in national insurance contributions had he continued working. That figure is anyway ultimately a matter of conjecture. The article provides, therefore, for a uniform deduction from lump sum entitlement of £600 where the man has no entitlement to unemployment benefit, or £550 if he has some entitlement but at less than the full rate. These figures represent a reasonable reduction taking account of the average national insurance contributions paid by those falling into the two categories and those typically paid by men who worked throughout the period of the strike.

There is one further provision in the draft order which I should mention. This concerns the treatment of former part-time workers who were employed for fewer than 30 hours per week. The benefits available under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme have been improved substantially under the present Government, notably in 1983, 1984 and under the present order. It is a generous scheme primarily designed fully to recompense those full-time employees who help the industry through its present period of necessary restructuring by taking voluntary redundancy. However, I suggest there can be no justification for providing those who take redundancy with higher weekly earnings than when they worked, nor for paying lump sums on the scale now provided under the scheme to former part-time employees who may have been employed for as little as 16 hours per week. The new order provides, therefore, that to be entitled to full scheme benefits a former employee must have been employed for 30 or more hours per week in the relevant tax year.

Before discussing the second of the two draft orders before us tonight, I think it would be right for me to say something about the future of the coal industry and the

[Mr. Hunt]

RMPS. In the past 12 months, the industry has made giant strides towards economic viability. Productivity has increased by one quarter and much uneconomic capacity has gone. This has been achieved without a single compulsory redundancy. All those who wished to remain in the industry have been able to do so. In the nature of things, an extractive industry can offer no guarantee that there will never be redundancies; and the future size and prosperity of the coal industry must depend on the success of men and management in making it competitive. There is no doubt that the recent fall in the price of oil increases the severity of the competition which the coal industry faces, and will make it necessary for the industry to strengthen still further the efforts it is making to eliminate losses.

Nevertheless, the Government's view is that the time is approaching when the NCB can, like the great majority of employers, take more responsibility for deciding and financing the redundancy terms which it offers. The new order will operate to the end of the National Coal Board's 1986-87 financial year, when the power to make schemes under the Coal Industry Act 1977 expires. It is right for me now to make it clear that it is not the Government's intention to introduce new legislation extending the power to make schemes beyond that date.

To enable payments to be made under the new schemes, it is necessary also to provide financial headroom. Section 4(3) of the Coal Industry Act 1983 increased the limit on aggregate cumulative expenditure on Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal Payments Schemes under the 1977 Act to £1,200 million. Section 3(3) of the Coal Industry Act 1985 gave the Secretary of State power to increase that limit by order made with the approval of the Treasury up to £1,800 million. The Coal Industry (Limit on Payments in Respect of Redundant Mineworkers) Order 1986 increases the limit to that figure.

When the 1985 Coal Industry Bill was presented to Parliament, it was impossible to know how many men would leave the industry under the redundant mineworkers and concessionary coal payments schemes then operating, nor what, if any, scheme would follow expiry of that scheme in March 1986. We were therefore faced with the choice of increasing the existing limit on expenditure to a figure so large that it could accommodate any conceivable circumstance, or providing for the power to increase the existing figure by order as and when circumstances required. As hon. and right hon. Members know, we adopted the latter course. The present order exercises the power then provided and provides the financial headroom to enable payments to be made under the new redundancy order. I should emphasise that the increase of £600 million in the limit of expenditure is not based upon an estimate of numbers who might leave in the coming year; it is simply the maximum envisaged in the 1985 Act and therefore compatible with the widest possible range of outcomes.

To conclude, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the Government have demonstrated by their financial support to the NCB over the past few years that they are committed to the creation of an efficient, competitive and viable coal industry; an industry capable of contributing to the national economy rather than one which must continually come cap in hand for further support; an industry with a proud future to match its proud past, capable of providing long-term, secure jobs with good earnings for those who work in it. The Government have further demonstrated by the redundancy terms they have made available and by their support for the National Coal Board's enterprise subsidiary, their equal commitment to ensuring that those who leave the industry as part of the present restructuring and their communities are as far as possible compensated and protected.

There are signs that the industry is now coming right. Productivity, which for so many years grew at a rate which was the despair of all those who cared and could only spell long-term disaster, improves month by month. Costs of production are falling.

The industry is not yet at a point at which we can say that all the difficulties are over, but the portents are good. The industry is leaner and fitter than it has been for many years. We can all see that with further efforts, and just a little good fortune, the industry may enter a new and prosperous era. The Government are committed to that goal and to providing the support necessary to make it possible. As part of that process I hope that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House will welcome the orders.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): We are asked to approve an increase from £1,200 million to £1,800 million because the Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal (Payments Schemes) Order 1984 expires at the end of the month. The revised orders extend the scheme until 28 March 1987 with some principal changes, which allow us to consider what has prompted them and to look at the coal industry today.

A new definition has been added to cover "coal industry employment". There have also been some technical alterations to the definitions of "days of employment", "industrial accident" and "industrial disease". I hope that the Minister will comment further on those when he replies. A definition has also been included to cover "severe disablement allowance". The definition of "subsidiary" has been amended to bring it up to date from the Companies Act 1948 to the Companies Act 1985.

The Minister tried to explain that under the present scheme part-time workers are not discriminated against. However, the new order introduces a pro rata reduction in benefits, and that is contained in article 5(1)(a) by reference to 30 hours and the pro rata extension of the weekly benefit table down from £35 to £10. There is also a consequential amendment to article 7 relating to the adjustment of basic benefit whereby a reference to employment on average for not less than 30 hours a week is introduced. Those amendments are clearly designed to reduce benefits in future to part-time employees in the industry.

As a result of the 1984-85 strike, a number of members, as the Minister indicated, have insufficient national insurance contributions to qualify for unemployment benefit in the benefit year commencing January 1986. That, in turn, means that men aged 50 and over who would normally have qualified for weekly benefit would be barred by virtue of failing to establish a right to unemployment benefit. To overcome that problem, the new order makes provision for an additional weekly benefit by switching the second order of unemployment benefit equivalent to be applied to the first year of scheme entitlement for unemployment benefit which will be payable in the second year. For example, under the new arrangements a person who is made redundant from the beginning of the tax year 1986-87, by registering as unemployed, will be given a credit towards the national insurance which will bring him back into entitlement to unemployment benefit in 1987 for 52 weeks. The Minister referred to the statement made by the Secretary of State on 19 December.

The Minister may want to correct me, but my information is that there will be a reduction in redundancy pay as a consequence of that arrangement. I hope that the Minister will confirm that when he replies.

The only other principal change is the revision of the weekly benefits tables in appendix 4 to select the increases in the level of unemployment benefit introduced with effect from November 1985. Apart from that, we are dealing only with the tables changing in relation to lump sum payments.

Tonight we are asked to approve the due process of law and legal enactment by discussing these orders affecting the coal industry. It is a strange irony that although such processes apply to Parliament, which we would defend, they do not apply to the working and administration of the National Coal Board. I will discuss three aspects of the board's conduct which could be related to the legality of the orders which we are being asked to approve this evening.

First, I shall deal with the new modified colliery review procedure. The old procedure gave the NCB the power to act as judge, jury and executioner. The new procedure, upon which many high hopes were pinned, has been dashed by the NCB's attitude, for example, to the Bates colliery closure and its decision to ignore the recommendations of the independent arbiter that the colliery should remain open.

The NCB has clearly interpreted the new procedure as allowing it to be the judge, jury and executioner on colliery closures. The NCB has done enormous damage by its action and destroyed any faith that people working in the industry may have had in the new procedure. There will be a further test tomorrow when the Kingsley Drift colliery in Yorkshire is considered under this new procedure.

The NCB continues to flout any form of judicial process and natural justice, and this is highlighted by its attitude to miners who were victims of the strike which ended over a year ago.

Industrial tribunals have given verdicts of unfair dismissals and recommended that miners should be reinstated. Union leaders have attempted to regain normality in those areas in the spirit of consultation and conciliation. However, in all but a few instances these attempts and recommendations have met a stony-faced reaction by the NCB.

The NCB has been given a legal opinion by no less an authority than the Attorney-General that it is in breach of the law if it tampers with the miners' pension fund and uses striking miners, in a dispute over a year old, as an excuse to delay the wage increases of members of the National Union of Mineworkers, unless that increase is tied to amending the miners' pension fund. Despite the legal advice that the NCB would be in breach of the law, it intends to spend money, which is not its own, on what could be an expensive legal action.

We need changes in the NCB, and a start should be made by the Government. They should ask the present chairman of the NCB, Mr. Ian MacGregor, to go now rather than in September. The industry and the country have had to put up with this expensive liability for too long.

The backcloth to the orders signals a further contraction of manpower in the mining industry. There will be more pit closures and more redundancies. The figures released for the past year show that 30,000 jobs have been lost. That is depressing. If the Minister is not concerned, the House certainly is concerned about the continued contraction of manpower in the industry.

The House is aware of the problems of energy provision as a consequence of the massive drop in oil price, referred to by the Minister. We were reminded of that when we debated the EEC document on state aids to the coal industry. It has not gone unobserved by some of us that, like baying wolves, the leaders of the Central Electricity Generating Board are going for the British coal industry in this energy price war which is confronting many nations in the world. The CEGB wants to import more foreign coal. It does not care whether it is Polish or South African coal, as long as the price is right. I hope that the Minister will tell us that the Central Electricity Generating Board has been told that it is not in the business of creating unemployment in the British coal industry by its quest for more imports of foreign coal.

I endorse what the Minister said about the performance of the industry and the way that the miners are responding to the needs and to the call of the nation to produce more coal. We do not oppose these orders, but the Minister must reply to some of the issues that I have raised, because they are of great importance not only to people working in the industry but to my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): I recently had the honour to be invited to a meeting in my constituency organised by the local National Farmers Union. I was slightly surprised when one old farmer told me that farmers did far better under Labour Governments and coal miners did better under Conservative Governments. That is probably just as well, because I have only about 100 farmers but more than 2,000 coal miners and a large number of retired miners in my constituency. On pondering this, I have to admit that there is some truth in the words of the old farmer. I do not want to go into the problems of agriculture, but history seems to bear out his view that coal miners have done substantially better under Conservative Governments.

It was under the Macmillan Government that coal pools were first arranged to provide fuel for miners over the age of 60. The Heath Government centralised those pools and backdated the concessionary coal allowances to miners aged over 55 on retirement and also backdated it to 1969. In 1983, this Government further reduced to 50 the age for concessionary coal and took over funding for the scheme from the coal pools. In doing that, the Government left out large numbers of miners who were under 60 when they were made redundant because of the massive pit closures of the Wilson Government in the 1960s. During that period, nearly half as many miners were made redundant in my constituency alone as were proposed by the National Coal Board in 1983 and 1984 for the whole country. Some 10,000 miners in my area were made redundant during the 1960s compared with only 20,000 proposed redundancies for the whole country in 1983 and 1984. Those proposed redundancies led to the Scargill strike.

[Mr. Phillip Oppenheim]

Many of the miners who were made compulsorily redundant under the Wilson Government in the 1960s have had a raw deal. Some worked in the pits from the age of 14 for as many as 30 years in conditions that were far worse than conditions pertaining in the pits today. In the mid-1960s many of them received letters from the chairman of the NCB telling them that the coal industry was set to expand and that their jobs were totally secure. Nonetheless, they were made redundant or at best offered jobs many miles away. When they were made compulsorily redundant under the Wilson Government they were given a pittance in redundancy money, far less in real terms than miners receive today. Furthermore, if they were under the age of 60 when they were made redundant, as many of them were, they received no concessionary coal, even though many of them had contributed to coal pools for miners aged over 60 in the reasonable expectation that they themselves would benefit from those pools. These are the forgotten miners. Their votes were taken for granted by their representatives for too long, and as a result, they got a raw deal.

It is true that most of the advances in the coal industry have come about during the periods of Conservative Governments—better redundancy terms, higher wages and far better concessionary coal allowances. Therefore, there is a precedent for the Government to make further improvements, and to allow retired miners the retrospective benefit, as happened in 1973. I accept that cost has to be a key factor, and I understand that recent estimates by the NCB put the cost of retrospectively extending concessionary coal to miners made redundant in the 1960s at some £3 million. This sounds a very large sum, but it represents only 10 per cent. of the total cost of the concessionary coal scheme that the Government already fund. Furthermore, it represents only 0·15 per cent. of the total cost of the coal industry to the taxpayer.

Concern and support for this is shown by the large number of Members who recently signed an early-day motion on this subject. Therefore, I strongly urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider extending retrospectively the concessionary coal allowances to those miners made redundant at the age of 60 in the 1960s. If he will not consider that, will he at least consider some one-off payment, or some benefit to these miners, who have had a raw deal?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) has referred to a matter that some of my hon. Friends will recall has been mentioned almost every time that these redundancies and concessionary coal orders have been debated. I find it rather strange that this Johnny-come-lately can join with those of us like my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McGuire) in calling for concessionary coal for those who did not get a square deal under the Tory Government.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Skinner: No, we have not got time. If the hon. Gentleman had been present at some of the coal debates over the past two or three years since he became a Member of Parliament, he would know all about the concern that has consistently been shown by my hon. Friends on this matter, because they represent almost every coalfield in Britain. That is why they signed my early-day motion on the matter.

I have news for the hon. Gentleman, which the Minister will confirm. When I wrote to the Secretary of State for Energy at the back end of last year about this matter for the umpteenth time—the Minister knows that I have raised it with him several times—the Secretary of State replied to the effect that, notwithstanding the new-found concern on the Tory Benches, he would not consider giving the concessionary coal to the pre-1968 people who did not get a square deal under any Government.

Mr. Oppenheim rose——

Mr. Skinner: No, I shall not give way. We do not have time, as many of my Friends want to speak on this and many other subjects.

If the hon. Gentleman only knew, he would appreciate that this matter has been raised consistently because some of the miners have done more than 40 years in the pits, and not many of them are left now, because many died. There are widows who should get the coal. It is true that it will cost only about £3 million, and that is why we argue that it should be implemented without any further delay. If the Government can find £2 billion for the farmers in 1984-85, which works out at a massive sum for every farmer in Britain, they could find the money for retired miners' and miner's widows, so that they can have the coal.

I remind the hon. Member for Amber Valley that some of the pits that shut in and around his constituency were not closed under a Labour Government—I happened to be a north Derbyshire miner. Almost without exception, the pits there were closed by the Macmillan Government, about which he spoke.

I want concessionary coal for the people in Blackwell, South Normanton, Pinxton, Tibshelf and all of the other villages in which the pits shut under the pre-1968 agreement. We are dealing with, perhaps, the first Secretary of State who has no influence with the chairman of the National Coal Board. We do not expect the Secretary of State to run the day-to-day administration of the NCB, but the present one is just a lame duck. He cannot get anywhere with the chairman. When the miners group met him recently, he was unable to challenge MacGregor on any of these issues. The Minister has to reply to these questions. Why does he and the Secretary of State not use their muscle? Why do they not use what influence they have with the chairman in his last few months? Why do they not send him packing?

It is remarkable that in Kent we have 47 miners, I believe, who have not been given their jobs back. A considerable proportion of them are branch officials. It is almost as if the NCB wanted to pick new officials for the Kent industry. If Ministers have any influence, they should use it to get some reinstatements in Kent, Yorkshire and Scotland. The BBC's "Open Space" programme tonight told of a branch secretary who went to a tribunal, which found that he should get his job back but, because MacGregor is in the driving seat and says that someone must pay for insubordination, he has still not been given his job back, like many others in Scotland.

In Derbyshire recently a man was supposedly given his job back. He and his mate were then sent along for a medical and he did not pass the hearing test. That is another form of victimisation.

The Secretary of State and the Minister have hardly any influence. That was shown graphically in the case of Bates colliery. The colliery review procedure was sabotaged by the NCB, and the Minister sits there, unable to use any influence despite the fact that, over and over again, the Prime Minister, when she was not dealing in shares in a mining company in Australia, said from the Dispatch Box that that procedure was sacrosanct. My hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) who represents NACODS, knows all about sacrosanct procedures and the promises that were made from the Dispatch Box.

The Minister has a chance. My hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) mentioned Kinsley drift. It has not been open long.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Six years.

Mr. Skinner: My hon. Friend says six years. Millions of pounds have been invested in the pit. There is a colliery review tomorrow. There is a picket at Hobart house, starting at 9.30 am. I had better get the advert in. If what happened to Bates happens to Kinsley drift, will the Minister use his influence to ensure that the pit gets a fair crack of the whip? I doubt it. During the strike and since, the Secretary of State and the Minister have not been able to do anything with respect to the chairman of the NCB. The Minister now has a chance to put things right, to show that he has some muscle and to give some hope to those who have been victimised. Some 500 miners are still without a job. It has been agreed in courts and tribunals that many of them have not done anything wrong. Perhaps 200 of them could be given their jobs back in the next few weeks. We would, perhaps, understand that, for the first time, the Minister and his right hon. Friend are beginning to use what power they have. Previous Secretaries of State have used that power and influence. We have seen nothing of it during the course of this Government's reign.

The price of oil has fallen again today. If market forces are left to operate, it could result in a massive further rundown in the mining industry. There could be closures on the same scale as in the 1950s and 1960s when Governments — whatever their political hue — decided that oil was cheap, that it could be obtained from the middle east and elsewhere for ever and that they would supplant the miners by using it. The massive drop in the oil price could mean that a Government who were hell-bent on allowing market forces to operate would allow cheap oil once again to supplant the 300 years' supply of coal which lies beneath the ground of Britain. That would be foolish, because no one can predict that there will not be a quadrupling of oil prices, as happened in 1972 and 1973.

I hope that the Under-Secretary will not listen to the siren voices of the Central Electricity Generating Board, which suggests in code language that it would not be a bad idea to move over to oil because it is cheap. Such a move would mean that more people will be thrown out of work. More miners would have to receive redundancy payments. More miners would be thrown on to the scrap heap and would have to go on the dole, resulting in a loss of tax revenue to the Government, and so on. I want the Under-Secretary of State to declare that the Government will not let market forces operate freely, that they will use coal and will ensure that the mining industry remains intact.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) was warbling a somewhat false note — a note that he and all hon. Members know to be false. One should note what the hon. Member for Bolsover said during those years when the Wilson Government were closing so many pits, giving no coal concessions and making no allowances. One would have thought that the hon. Gentleman would sing a song crying out for help for the miners, but there was silence from him. He began to sing that song only when the Conservative party came to office, and, even then, he was not singing it too loudly. Last year, there was an hour and a half debate on this subject; this year, it is a three hour debate. Apart from when the hon. Gentleman tried to interrupt other hon. Members, we heard nothing from him on this subject.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): Was he here?

Mr. Ashby: Yes, he was here, but we heard little on this subject until my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) and I tabled an early-day motion on concessionary coal for miners. Three or four days later, the hon. Member for Bolsover came rushing in saying, "I had forgotten about that. Let us get on with it." He then tabled his early-day motion. He is always second best. He does not really care about the miners for whom he says he cares so much.

Productivity has increased and the costs of production have fallen in the coal industry. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State said, we now have a leaner, fitter and more prosperous industry. The coal orders are almost the swan song of the Government's involvement in the industry. It is nice to realise that the coal industry is about to be able to stand on its own two feet? It will be able to produce its own redundancy schemes. It is becoming a good profitable business. No group can be prouder than the miners of being party to this development. They do not want an industry that is supported up to the neck by the taxpayers. They want a sleek, prosperous industry of which they can be proud.

We have a new mine coming on line in south Leicestershire. Asfordby, a new superpit, will be part of the leaner and more profitable industry. I asked for, and indeed have had, undertakings from the chairman that the people of south Leicestershire will be considered first for jobs in the new pit. They have worked throughout and suffered redundancies, and they will look to the Asfordby pit for the future of their industry. I am grateful that they can look to it for future jobs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) referred to the early-day motion which I have had the pleasure of signing. When did most of the major redundancies take place, and when were most of the pits closed? We have to look to the years of the Wilson Government, when many pits were closed and redundancy terms were bad. Under the Conservative Government there have been substantial redundancy payments, and coal allowances have increasingly been given to younger people, and men have been able to leave the pits with dignity, having worked there for many years. It is a far cry from the early years.

There is just one anomaly, and it will not cost much to remedy. I hope that a caring Government and the National Coal Board will take action. I refer to the granting of a concessionary coal allowance to all those who would have been entitled to it if they were retiring now. It is not much to ask. The amounts and the numbers are not very large. Advertisements have appeared in my constituency asking those who would be entitled to a coal allowance to contact me so that the numbers can be ascertained. I have received many letters from retired miners, all speaking of the hardship that they have suffered and all asking that the concessionary coal allowance be extended to them. I shall quote from just one of them:

"I am writing on behalf of my husband . . . who is now 74 years old. He is one of the miners you refer to in the local papers. He was made redundant in the late 60s under the Wilson government having been made redundant with a miserly £600 and no coal at the age of 59 years. When he came home and told me what was going to happen I felt very sad as he had several working years left and couldn't get another job and was thrown on the scrapheap. The business of not having the coal allowance hit us very hard . . . for 16 years and had to buy every cobble which does not seem right when a man has worked in the pits for 43 years on the face producing the coal . . . My husband is a Burton man. He trained the Bevin boys and dedicated his life to the miners. We think what was done with the Wilson Government was indeed a very shabby trick, and we vowed we would never vote Labour again, which we haven't."

That is the view of so many of the miners who were made redundant in the 1960s. They feel that they were let down by the Wilson Government — and indeed they were. We, on the other hand, have not let them down. We have supported and looked after them. We should try to make some restitution for the shabby trick that was played upon the coal miners under the Wilson Government. I am asking the Government to adopt a magnanimous approach and to put right the wrong for which the Opposition know they were responsible.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) doth protest too much, not in raising the issue—a cause to which he is welcome among the many hon. Members who have sought to deal with the long-standing problem that affects those people who do not benefit from the concessionary coal scheme—but in his zeal in directing his attack specifically at the activities of the Wilson Government, for which there is a reasonable justification. However, his zeal suggested a diversionary tactic away from some of the problems that have arisen during the period of this Government. He slightly lost his sense of perspective about some of the problems that have arisen during the last two years under the current chairman of the National Coal Board. But let us not complain. Instead let us all join in pressing the Minister to take this step, as the alliance has done over a considerable period.

These orders concern the number of people who retire early or who become redundant by accepting voluntary redundancy as a result of the great changes that are taking place in the coal industry. Those changes are very apparent in the Northumberland coalfield. Many people come into these categories, and many of them come into my constituency to work. They accept employment by transfer to two of the only three remaining collieries in the Northumberland coalfield. Two of those collieries are in my constituency. A considerable question mark hangs over the only remaining colliery that lies outside my constituency. Questions have recently been raised about one of the two collieries in my constituency.

One problem, above all others, has caused anger and great anxiety in the Northumberland coalfield and elsewhere in the coal industry in recent weeks — the attitude of the NCB to the colliery review procedure relating to Bates colliery. For the NCB so markedly to have failed the test of this new procedure by its complete refusal to take any notice of it has removed from the Government any credit that was attached to them for placing emphasis on that procedure during the long months of the dispute. If there is to be any respect at all for the procedure, it has to be respected by the NCB. There may come a time when it will be reasonable for the NCB to take issue in detail with a recommendation of the independent review procedure.

I do not think anybody ever claimed that the colliery review procedure had an absolute right always to override the judgment of the NCB, but for the NCB to take no notice of it whatsoever and to dismiss out of hand the recommendations of the review procedure on Bates colliery has completely destroyed any confidence that could be placed in that procedure and has done considerable damage at a time when attempts were being made on all sides to bring about reconciliation and introduce a new atmosphere into the coalfields. The Government must recognise the seriousness of the NCB's actions in this instance.

Another issue that has caused anxiety in the Northumberland coalfield is the future of Whittle colliery. On several occasions the NCB has stated that that colliery is part of its strategy for the area and that it attaches considerable importance to it. Its coal finds a ready sale. It produces the highest quality household coal. When supply difficulties arise at Whittle I am bombarded with complaints from constituents and coal merchants about their inability to get coal from that colliery and about their dissatisfaction with the substitute that they are offered instead. It produces a great deal of constituency correspondence.

There have been geological difficulties at Whittle, as is well known, which have prevented it recently from achieving the very significant improvements in production targets of recent years. The question has been raised by NACODS in recent weeks as to whether a wholly unrealistic target was being set by the NCB for the preparation of a new face at Whittle to enable it to continue profitably in production. I raised this issue with the area director and I have received further assurances about the future of that pit, but I must emphasise to the Minister that anxieties remain. In a letter which I received yesterday the area director said:

"It is precisely because Whittle was part of my Area strategy that I have initiated a special development programme to prepare a replacement coal face. The programme is certainly very demanding, but the organisation and resources are being provided to meet it."

I hope that that means that the work will continue even if whatever initial timetable has been set for it cannot be met.

I do not think that anyone denies the urgency of the work. Certainly nobody who works at the pit wants, in any way, to delay bringing the new face into production. Their future as well as their current earnings depend on it. If Whittle colliery's future were not to be safeguarded the effects on the area of Northumberland around Alnwick and Amble and on many people now coming in from much further afield in the Ashington and Blyth areas would be disastrous. Whittle is already absorbing men from Bates colliery, as is Ellington.

It is Ellington which remains the prize of the coal industry in the north-east of England and we all depend on its future. The pit has notable achievements to its credit and is now absorbing labour from all parts of the Northumberland coalfield.

Mr. Jack Thompson (Wansbeck): The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) is a neighbour of mine. I think he will recognise that the problems of Whittle colliery and the problem of non-profitability that will arise —I accept the point he has raised—will be covered by the profitability at Ellington and Ashington collieries. That is the way that the National Coal Board ought to organise things. If it is not organising things, each colliery will stand on its own merits. Therefore we may face the problem that Whittle colliery, which employs some people from my constituency, may go under because it has to stand on its own, and not be supported by a neighbouring colliery which is very profitable.

Mr. Beith: It is my belief that in due course Whittle colliery will be able to stand on its own feet and be a profitable colliery. The question is whether it will be carried sufficiently over the period in which the essential work needs to be done. The danger of taking what the hon. Gentleman said to its logical conclusion is that we have had a history in the coal industry of pits being pulled down by the number of other pits they were having to carry. I think that the hon. Gentleman is right to stress that there may be a period, we are going through it now, in which Whittle has to be sustained by the industry to be brought back to profitability, which I am sure can be achieved.

Hanging over all the arguments about profitability is a point mentioned earlier about oil prices. Clearly, that is leading the NCB to pose fresh questions about the profitability of a number of pits. Those of us who are concerned, not just about the coal industry but about the future energy provision of our nation, are bound to record the extraordinary variations wich have occurred in the oil price over the years and the political factors which tend to determine that price. There can be no mistaking the political forces which are at work in the current reductions in the price of oil. We cannot place total reliance on a future of low oil prices.

One of the great advantages this country enjoys is the freedom that its coal supplies give it to have a wide range of energy sources, without firm dependence on any one of them, and not to be impelled to rush into the development of nuclear power at a time when there are so many unanswered questions in that area. Our coalfields give us a considerable advantage and we should not throw that advantage away, least of all on the assumption that the present oil prices will continue to drop and to stay down indefinitely.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): I was not intending to say anything at all. However, looking across at the Opposition Benches I do not see any Labour members from Nottinghamshire here to listen and take part in this important debate on the coal industry. This is not the first time that the Benches have been empty of those hon. Members. However, I shall be charitable and say that the right hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Concannon) has been suffering from a car injury which he sustained on his way back from the labour party conference last year.

I was listening closely to my hon. Friend the Minister when he was talking about the future prospects and prosperity of the coal industry. I know that he speaks from fact. He visited Nottinghamshire last week and heard for himself about the record production which is taking place daily. Records are being broken in every pit in that county, not for the first time, but weekly. Thorsby colliery is turning out almost 10 tonnes per man shift. The area director has informed me that next year we shall be producing 18·5 million tonnes of coal from the Nottinghamshire coalfield, at a cost which competes with oil at $15 per barrel. That is the future for coal.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary talked about the redundancy terms that will come to an end on 31 March next year. I know that he hopes that all those who want to participate in the scheme will be able to do so. When my hon. Friend sees the chairman of the NCB, I hope that he will insist that a proper early retirement scheme is in place when the terms come to an end. In my maiden speech in the House I said that 55 would be the right age for miners to retire. That is also the aim of, and has been endorsed by, the Union of Democratic Mineworkers. Therefore, when my hon. Friend sees the chairman, I hope that he will say that when the scheme finishes, a suitable retirement age for miners in the industry should be put in its place.

I remind my hon. Friend that during that unnecessary strike, caused by we all know who, miners in working areas were not able to participate in the scheme because of the need to produce coal. Will those who have not been able to take part be allowed an extension if the NCB finds that time is not on their side?

With those few remarks, I leave it to my hon. Friend to answer my questions when he replies to the debate.

12.1 am

Mr. Michael McGuire (Makerfield): The hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) must not go round deluding himself that it was the Wilson Government, as he kept reminding us, who gave the miners a raw deal. I was a pit secretary as long ago as 1957, when Jimmy Bowman was chairman of the National Coal Board, putting down massive stocks of coal. We started the market forces argument then. Nearly every pit in the constituency that I represent was closed before I came to the House. The miners got sweet nothing. I think £200 was the agreement, and that was under the great Government that the hon. Gentleman was praising.

We can say that we did not do as well for the retired miners as we should, but we shall not listen and take lessons from Conservative Members, telling us what great Conservative Governments did. Real closures took place when I was a pit secretary. The Wigan coalfield closed almost entirely, and we had the job of receiving the miners at our pit.

Hon. Members have referred to the contrast between what men get now and what they got then. There are Members of Parliament here who were working in the mines when I was a pit secretary. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) will remember that there was no pension for men who retired before 1952, and who had worked a lifetime in the pit. That was during the great Conservative Government of Macmillan, to which the hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West referred. Those who retired before 1952 did not get a brass farthing in pension, after a lifetime in the industry.

We decided that all working miners should contribute 4d a week for a pension for those who had done a lifetime in the industry. I remember one of the sad, yet joyful, occasions when old men came into the office — the union cabin, as we called it — the tears were blinding them, because they had got a 10 bob pension. But it had to be taken off what was known as the national assistance. Those men took pride in getting that 10 bob, which we paid for. So we have moved on a long way.

I hope that the hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West will take a friendly rebuke. He should not tell us the nonsense that the miners got glory when the Tories were in and a rough deal when we were in. They have had a better deal over the years. We could have done more for them.

Tory Members are wrong to rebuke my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover, not that he cannot deal with rebukes from Tories. He can deal with them equally well when he gets them from our side. I have been on these Benches with him many times when together, in debates such as this, we have raised the matter of concessionary coal, and the gap in that concession. I am glad that the Tories are joining in, although it is cold comfort. I hope that they can persuade the Minister, because he is the lad, with the Secretary of State, who can put things right. A Tory has threatened to resign if the Government put a nuclear disposal unit in his constituency. That passion must not go unrewarded. Tories can also say that if concessionary coal is not given, they will resign. That would convince me.

I want to convince the Secretary of State that this scandal has lasted long enough. We are talking about a 10-year qualification when men have worked a lifetime in the industry. That is a scandal. The money involved is little, but the reward to the widows and the few men who are still alive would be great.

All hon. Members, Tory, Labour and Liberal — I must not forget the Liberals — know that to give a widow or an old miner concessionary coal is one of the most rewarding of experiences. Some of these people have been forgotten and left by the wayside.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McGuire: No. I have to sit down soon because colleagues wish to speak.

Some miners are still being sacked. The NCB has been vindictive beyond measure. There is a patchwork across the country. In some areas men who have been convicted of minor offences have had their jobs back, but other men have experienced the heavy hand of vindictiveness and malicious spite and have not got their jobs back.

Anybody understanding my views on the strike will know that I sometimes disputed with my colleagues the efficacy of the strike. But that has gone. I believe that men are being discriminated against, sometimes because they are local union leaders. That is a shame. It is a bigger shame that the Secretary of State and his colleagues have not used their influence. We are not saying that every sacked miner should be given back his job. None of us is foolish enough to say that. But there should be an examination of men who were unfairly, vindictively, sacked and who remain sacked. Until their cases are examined and a sense of fair play prevails, the sore in the mining industry will fester.

The pendulum has swung. The miners' union is almost impotent. It is divided. I shall not go into the reasons. The pendulum will swing back. The miners will not forget the treatment that they received—and they will be right not to forget.

Let us see some movement. This is our strong view. I hope that the Minister will lean on the chap on whom he can lean. Those of us who read the football reports know what happens when the manager is not quite doing his stuff and there is a threat to bring someone else in. In this case that chap is already in on a free transfer from the steel industry. When that happens, it is a question of "On your bike, mate." He should not have got the job, but now he is second in command and another will take over in a couple of months. The Secretary of State and his colleagues should get together with him and say "We want this put right." We are not saying that every sacked miner should regain his job, but we want to see fair play.

During the debate on the colliery review procedure on 5 February 1985, we were told that the miners had no need to fear any question——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going rather wide of the debate. I am sure that he can relate his remarks to the order.

Mr. McGuire: I am not sure whether you were judicially deaf during an earlier part of the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when the issue of the review was touched upon. I wish to speak only briefly about it in taking up the remarks of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). I believe that the House was misled on 5 February 1985 because of the inference that was to be drawn from what the NCB was publicising at that stage. It was said that no colliery would close merely because the board wanted to close it and that any proposed closure would be the subject of an impartial and independent review. If the board is saying, "If the review leads to a contrary decision to that which we have taken, we shall still go ahead and close the pit," the debate on 5 February 1985 was a farce and the House was misled. We must ensure that there is a proper review procedure and an independent adjudication, and we should abide by the decision of the adjudicating body. I hope that the Minister will get that across to the coal board.

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): Raising the ceiling for redundancy payments in the pits enables us to air our views on job losses, and I shall confine my remarks to that issue. Pits are closing at a faster rate than anyone imagined and redundancies are taking place on a scale which might eventually endanger the industry. This has nothing to do with a pre-arranged hit list.

One major area of concern is the National Coal Board's new accounting procedures, allied with the recommendations of the Waddilove committee's report. Instead of national, or even area, accounting procedures whereby some profitable pits might help keep some marginally unprofitable pits open, two stringent tests apply to each pit. The first test comes from the interest charges on the capital investment at each pit being attributable to that pit. The second test is that the costs of subsidence damage caused by mining from a pit shall also be added to the pit's costs. That means that a pit that is near a built-up area is penalised to a greater extent on the second test than one in the country.

Redundancies that affect my constituents are being declared at Redbrook colliery near Barnsley. There were 1,189 men working at that pit in April 1985 and only 865 in February 1986, and the work force is to be further reduced to 500. With massive capital investment, both underground and on the surface, high interest charges have to be paid by the pit. As the pit is on the edge of Barnsley, as it were, high subsidence compensation payments have to be paid as well. The alternative is not to work the coal. To avoid subsidence compensation payments, faces have been cut back and redundancies have been declared. In the end, the pit will be lucky to survive.

I have no doubt that it could be proved that what I have described is the result of bad planning on the board's part, that it was a bad investment that led to the loss of millions of pounds and that the accounting procedures are making it difficult for the pit to survive.

Some of my constituents work at Kinsley drift, which is not far from Barnsley. The pit is only six years old. Again, there has been vast investment. I understand that it amounted to £30 million. Kinsley drift became a wonder pit and now it is on the eve of closure. The final appeal goes before the Coal Board tomorrow. Can anyone doubt that another mistake on the part of the Coal Board was made at this pit?

Members of the women's campaign against pit closures came to see me this past weekend. The campaign is based in Barnsley and its members have been demonstrating and campaigning against the closure of Kinsley drift and the effects that that will have on coalfield communities, and rightly so. As I have said, £30 million has been spent and yet the pit is to close after only six years. Who is to blame? What a waste! I have no doubt that there are many similar examples.

The Department of Energy should set up an an independent inquiry team and give it status and power to investigate the past plans and investment schemes at Redbrook, Kinsley drift and other pits in the British coalfields. All that must necessitate a vigorous and detailed examination. The NCB has made major investment mistakes, there have been many unneccessary redundancies and the British taxpayers, the House and the National Union of Mineworkers have a right to know who are the guilty men.

There are now only 135 pits in the country and a labour force of 139,000. In only 11 months—from 30 March 1985 to 1 March 1986—31,637 men have left the industry nearly all of them through redundancies. What is most disturbing is that during that time the NCB imported 12,600,000 tonnes of coal. That tonnage meant 12,000 job losses in the industry. Contracts were no doubt stepped up during the miners' strike, but we do not know for how long they must carry on.

The vast coal imports plus the present fall in oil prices have caused a serious turn of events in the aftermath of the coal strike. Many more redundancies could result and no doubt the CEGB is exploiting the cheap oil and oil-fired power stations are being prepared to come on stream. With cheap coal imports and cheap oil the CEGB has the National Coal Board over a barrel when it comes to negotiations over the annual coal contracts.

The coal industry could be seriously undermined if that situation continues for long. More pits are bound to close under present management policies and through Government indifference. The Secretary of State should step in and, if necessary, use his directive powers to cut coal imports and check the CEGB from switching to oil burning. The rundown of the coal industry has already gone far enough. If it is run down much further, if there is a high rise in oil prices and if shipping freight prices also rise, and then there is a fresh upsurge in the demand for coal, we shall rue the fact that the Minister did not act before it was too late.

The Minister should elaborate on the points that I have raised when he replies to the debate. Will the Minister tell us how many miners have taken voluntary redundancy since the end of the strike? How much has been paid out in lump sums? What is the current annual payment for redundant miners' pensions? Why is there no appeal procedure over redundancy payments? Hon. Members who represent mining constituencies are often approached when there is a difference between a miner and the NCB regarding his payments. Why has no appeal board been established? In view of the numbers involved now, and doubtless that number will rise, why has that board not been established? Finally, the NCB and the Minister have been able to say that all the redundancies have been voluntary and that there have been no compulsory retirements. Will the Minister assure the House and the mineworker's union that that will continue to be the case?

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): I will intervene only briefly in the debate, as other hon. Members wish to speak, but several points have arisen on which I would like to comment.

My first point relates to the question of concessionary coal, but I do not want to go over all the points that have been argued so eloquently on the Floor of the House on that issue already this evening. However, I believe that if the Government could find the relatively small sums of money involved it would do a great deal to put right an injustice that has existed for a long time and would earn much good will for the Government.

I should like to link my first point with a request to my hon. Friend the Minister to consider what further progress has yet to be made in relation to the miners who took redundancy after the strike began and who have lost out on the full benefits to which they reasonably thought they were entitled.

During the debate reference has been made to various industrial tribunal cases and to the NCB's attitude in not taking back miners as a result of the decisions of those tribunals. If the NCB took back miners whom it has dismissed and who it reasonably believed had been guilty of violence and intimidation during the strike, that would make a mockery of the courage of the working miners who stood by the NCB during the strike and would go against the principles for which the Government have fought and for which the country has paid so dearly. The NCB must be satisfied that it has the full support of the House or at least of Conservative Members in making sure that there is no place in the mining industry for the wreckers, the violent and the intimidators.

Finally, let me make a general comment on the future of the coal industry, on which there has already been much comment. Clearly the industry's future and survival must depend on its being profitable and my hon. Friend's announcement showed that the industry is now close to being able to stand on its own feet, which must be good news and reassuring to all who work in the industry.

Obviously, however, a cloud has been cast by the drop in oil prices and that must reflect upon the targets and profitability of the mining industry. But will my hon. Friend recall that oil prices can go shooting up just as fast as they have come down and all it needs is for the oil sheikhs to meet together and agree on production cuts for oil prices to start rising again. If we have learnt one lesson from the 1970s, it must be that we need an energy policy that ensures not just the profitability of the industries that produce energy, but also certainty of supply, and there can be no better certainty of supply than from coal that is mined in Britain.

For our strategy and our future we need a diverse energy market. We need diverse energy resources, but within that diversity coal must have an important part to play.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): I notice that the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin) is in the Chamber, and he is a singular reminder of the vagaries of oil prices and markets. Those of us who have a bit of a memory will acknowledge that his stricture during the energy crisis in 1973 was that we should brush our teeth in the dark. We should remember that oil prices have a way not only of going down but of going up fairly rapidly. However, I do not want to discuss energy policy this evening because time does not permit.

The hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) said that the NCB had to face the results of industrial tribunals. I want to put on record the course taken by my constituent, Mr. Robert Young. The Under-Secretary will know that we met him on that matter on 5 March. I am informed that my constituent has had an offer of reinstatement by the NCB. The vagaries of the procedures involved show the degree of vindictiveness and the extent to which the NCB was willing to go—even to offering perjured evidence at a tribunal—in order to deny Mr. Young his democratic rights.

I have reported the matter to the Minister. We know that Mr. Young was charged and fined £75 for a breach of the peace. He was interviewed on 19 August by the colliery manager. He went to an industrial tribunal on 13 January and there the NCB said that it was not contesting unfair dismissal, but was not willing to re-engage Mr. Young because of his behaviour during the interview at Comrie colliery.

As I have told the House previously, my constituent had the presence of mind to tape proceedings. Had he not done so he would have been damned to perpetual unemployment in so far as any chance of being re-engaged or reinstated by the NCB is concerned. I use this example to demonstrate that we in Scotland had 206 victimised, not dismissed, miners. At present, we still have 127 victimised miners. Ten of my constituents are similarly placed as are many more who are not my constituents but who are employed in pits in my area.

The NCB was willing to spend public money defending a case that was indefensible. I want that put on records an illustration of the NCB's mind in Scotland. If the Minister wants to enhance his reputation and that of the coal industry in Scotland, he should take urgent steps to wipe the slate clean. My constituent fears that there is the danger that, having got the offer of reinstatement, he will return to the colliery, Comrie, and find that it is under threat of closure. Those who have knowledge of the mining industry know that if there is no redevelopment, the colliery is almost certain to be scheduled for closure.

The Minister ought to take urgent steps to put the record straight with regard to victimised miners. He ought to give an assurance to the Scottish mining industry that there will be adequate capital development and security of employment for miners in my area and throughout Scotland.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): I wish to raise a constituency problem which is related to the orders that we are discussing tonight. It concerns a group of employees who were formerly employed by the National Coal Board but who are now employed by an engineering company which is a subsidiary of the NCB — the Tredomen Engineering Works at Ystrad Mynach.

I have been chasing the Minister, his predecessor the Secretary of State, the NCB, the area director and the chairman of the NCB to get some satisfaction for hundreds of miners who have been made redundant due to the decline of the coal industry, and many of whom have been denied payment from the redundant mineworkers payments scheme even though they are entitled to payment from the mineworkers pension scheme. In 1983 I asked the Minister's predecessor whether he would consider making provision for the payment of the RMPS to employees of Tredomen. In reply, he said that Tredomen, though a wholly-owned subsidiary of the National Coal Board, was a limited company engaged in the manufacture of specialised mining equipment not only for the board but for other organisations, and that it was not the kind of establishment providing services ancillary to collieries for which the RMPS was designed. The Minister said that the answer was no for three reasons: first, that the company was a wholly-owned subsidiary of the NCB and it was a limited company; secondly, that the company did not manufacture exclusively for the board and, thirdly, that it was not the type of establishment for which the RMPS was designed. Yet on page 14 of these orders it is made clear that the orders apply to people employed not only directly by the board but by its subsidiaries.

I have confirmation from Mr. Ian MacGregor, the chairman of the NCB, that for the past eight years the Tredomen Engineering Company did between 95 and 98 per cent. of its work directly for the NCB. If that is not working exclusively for the NCB, I do not know what is.

Payments can be made from the RMPS to people who are employed in estate and house maintenance depots, in headquarters and regional offices and establishments, civil engineering depots and workshops. They are covered by appendix 1 on page 45 of the order. In 1973 the Tredomen employees, employed directly by the NCB, were told in a letter that their conditions of employment would be protected on the transfer of their employment from the NCB. If all the other categories of people can receive payment from the RMPS, the workers facing redundancy from Tredomen should be entitled to receive it. I ask the Minister to consider this matter. I am awaiting a detailed reply on these specific points.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I support what my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) said about Redbrook. Investment in collieries ought to be examined. There is such a long lead-in time that it is totally unfair to load the cost on one colliery. The investment period in Redbrook started about 15 years ago when plants in the Barnsley area were designated for alteration and rejuvenation. It is entirely wrong to load on to the 450 men in one colliery the capital costs of what would be sustained by at least 1,500 men.

I should like to ask about people who do not receive unemployment benefit. People who go in for the business scheme are normally allowed up to £40 per week from the Department of Employment to help them with ideas for creating a small business. The £40 depends upon the receipt of unemployment pay. My workers are not in receipt of unemployment benefit and when they apply to be considered under the small business scheme they are turned down. I have written to the Under-Secretary in the Department of Employment, and perhaps the Minister will take up the matter on an interdepartmental basis to see whether he can get rid of what is clearly an anomaly.

12.30 am

Mr. David Hunt: I say to my hon. Friends the Members for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim), Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby), Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) and Elmet (Mr. Batiste), and to the hon. Members for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie), Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), and Makerfield (Mr. McGuire), the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason), and the hon. Members for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas), Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) that I do not have sufficient time tonight to deal adequately with the points they raised, but I shall write to them, just as I shall respond to those hon. Members who have not caught your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about any points they raise with me in correspondence.

My hon. Friends the Members for Elmet, Sherwood and Leicestershire, North-West spoke about the announcement I made of the ending of the scheme. When the scheme was introduced the then Minister for Power, Mr. Richard Marsh, made it clear that it was a temporary scheme to provide a breathing space. On 5 December 1967, Mr. Marsh said:

"Therefore, the purpose of the Bill is to give the industry a breathing space to help it to get the level of productivity to enable it to compete with other industries." — [Official Report, 5 December 1967; Vol. 755, c. 1269.]

We have seen a marvellous breakthrough in productivity. There is a new pride in the industry. I found that last week when I went underground at Bilsthorpe with my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood. As he constantly reminds the House, as do my other hon. Friends, the industry must never forget the debt it owes to the courage and determination of working miners. I am sure I shall find the same pride when I go underground with my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West at Donisthorpe this week as I found at Point of Ayr, Monkton Hall, Ellington, Wearmouth, Wistow, Lady Windsor Abercynon, and other collieries I have visited since the end of the strike.

Productivity records have been broken week after week as miners fight to achieve the viable competitive industry that is the only sure way to secure their jobs in the long term. I say to my hon. Friends who raised with me the matter of concessionary coal that I fully understand the strength of feeling that exists on this issue and the disappointment felt by mineworkers who, when they were working contributed to coal pools, but under the rules of the schemes to which they have contributed have no entitlement following redundancy. I listened carefully to my hon. Friends in the debate and also to what they said to me prior to this debate, but I fear that against the background of the industry and the decision of successive Governments, I will be able only to reach the conclusion of previous reviews: that further extensions to existing arrangements would not be justified.—

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business).

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal (Payments Schemes) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 10th March, be approved.

Resolved,

That the draft Coal Industry (Limit on Payments in respect of Redundant Mineworkers) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 10th March, be approved.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments &c.).

BROADCASTING

That the draft Broadcasting (Local Sound Broadcast Programme Contractors' Additional Payments) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 4th March, be approved.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

HARBOUR, DOCKS, PIERS AND FERRIES

That the draft Ports (Finance) Act 1985 (Increase of Grants Limit) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 7th March, be approved.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 80(5) (Standing Committees on European Community documents).

POWERED INDUSTRIAL TRUCKS

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 6893/79, a proposal for a Council Directive on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to self-propelled industrial trucks and of the supplementary explanatory memorandum for the Department of Trade and Industry dated 28th November 1985 and 17th February 1986; and accepts the need substantially to reduce current non-tariff barriers to the exports of United Kingdom-based manufacturers whilst ensuring a satisfactory level of health and safety protection.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

Question agreed to.

PETITION

Sunday Trading

Mr. Tom Sackville (Bolton, West): I beg leave to present a petition to the House on behalf of 1,500 of my constituents. It reflects their deep conviction that Sunday has special characteristics as a day of rest, recreation and worship for the benefit of family and community life. They believe that the current legislation before Parliament allowing for unlimited trading on Sunday will diminish those characteristics of Sunday.

To lie upon the Table.

English Estates

Motion made and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

12.34 am

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): I am grateful for the chance to instigate a short debate about English Industrial Estates Corporation, called English Estates. It is one of England's biggest developers and is certainly one of England's largest high-tech developers. That may not be as well known as it should be in the House, but it is known to us in the north-east, because over two thirds of its developing industrial footage lies in the northern region, just as its headquarters do. It is appropriate that a north-east Member should be sponsoring a debate about English Estates and allowing us the opportunity to explore with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary the role of English Estates nationally and its particular importance for a region such as the north-east.

This is also a timely debate, because last week my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was able to announce a substantial increase in the funding for English Estates over and above that which was originally feared. It was originally suggested that some £25 million might be available for that year, and for each of the next three years. My right hon. Friend has been able to ensure spending, although perhaps not funding, of some £32 million. That is a modest increase on this year's £30·5 million. It will help English Estates to carry forward the programme that it envisaged last year, and to finance continuing development in the north-east, especially in the counties of Durham and Cleveland. I understand that that forward programming will include a substantial development in Darlington, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary may be able to say something about that.

I welcome the increase in funding and the restoration of what was originally threatened to be a substantial cut. I particularly welcome the pledge that was originally given on 25 May 1984, that the provision made in English Estate's budget for the development at Chatham and the west would not affect its programmes and commitments in our assisted areas. There has been good news about funding and I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will be able to confirm that.

Another important aspect for English Estates, in securing the medium-term future, is the corporation's management. I was a little disappointed that the efforts to put together a management-led buy-out last August now appears to have floundered. There would have been considerable advantages for the Government, in both the capital receipts that would have accrued from such a buy-out, and the knowledge that Government programmes would still have been commissioned and carried forward by English Estates, as a private company.

There would also have been advantages to English Estates. It would have been able to set slightly longer-term objectives than the Government are often able to set for it. It might have been able to move towards a more broadly based and developed company, free of some of the constraints that Government and Treasury, of necessity, impose on such a public body. It would also have been free from the public expenditure survey committee lobbying and so on.

The company might also have been able to replace some of the more strict terms laid down by Whitehall for the pay and conditions of staff, with a more commercial and realistic set of incentives and awards based on performance. Although that has not happened, I hope that the moves towards improved management will not be relaxed, and that initiatives such as the northern subsidiary of English Estates will be pursued. I also hope that on pay and reward for staff, the Treasury might be persuaded, once it has resolved the small matter of the English Estates report and accounts for last year, to adopt in turn a more flexible approach.

Another aspect which is relevant to the future of English Estates is the decision which will soon be made to end the three development corporations in the north-east — Aycliffe, Peterlee and Washington. Their life was extended again by the Government to 31 March 1988, which is less than two years away. I do not believe that there is any realistic prospect of a further extension being granted, even if we were in favour of it.

It is appropriate for the Government to consider soon the bodies that are best suited to take over, not simply the physical estates of those three new town corporations but their role in attracting inward investment and in making the localities more attractive places for development and industrial growth.

I realise that this is not entirely a matter for my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and that his Department has to have consultations with another Department about it. I submit that English Estates, properly organised, is the best body to take on the development corporations' role. It is already based in the north-east. I believe that it could happily pool the estates of the development corporations with its own industrial estate to form a larger industrial portfolio. It might be able to sell the attractions of the north-east to a wider market, internationally and nationally, it might be able to retain some of the skills and expertise of the existing development corporations. It would certainly be able to ease the transition period by taking over an increasing part of the management of the estates.

Assisted areas, such as the north-west and the north-east, are crucial to the role of English Estates. I am not denigrating the developments undertaken at Chatham and in the west midlands. I understand the reasons for the involvement of English Estates in those areas. However, I believe that the greater challenge lies in the north of Britain, especially in the north-east, because that is where the greater development potential lies. In the north-east we have perhaps the greatest potential of any English region for further and future development. We have the space which the modern company needs. We have an abundance of attractively priced land and housing. We have the attractive countryside, which the modern company likes to have around it. Too much of that land lies undeveloped.

The register of publicly owned land, which was set up by the Government in 1980, reveals that a huge number of acres in public ownership are unused, undeveloped and awaiting development. There are more than 4,000 acres in Tyne and Wear, nearly 4,000 acres in Cleveland, nearly 3,000 acres in the county of Durham and nearly 2,000 acres in Northumbria—a total of just under 13,000 acres of publicly owned land—ripe for development but sat on by local councils. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State may wish to consider when local councils are not prepared to develop land or to let other people have the chance to develop it whether the Government, instead of ordering the land to be sold, should invite English Estates to develop some of it.

In the north-east we have not only space but resources. There are the natural resources of energy, water, offshore gas and coal. There are also the human resources—the skills in engineering which have been transformed into skills in the new technologies and the biotechnologies. It is often forgotten that 16,800 people work in the north-east in electronics and another 5,000 work in pharmaceuticals.

There is a fear in the region that we lose out to the south-east in high technology and new technology development and that too much applied research is heavily concentrated in the south. A recent survey shows that plants in the south-east have an average of 24 people employed directly in research and development. An equivalent plant in the north-east has only nine. The region has a lower record of product innovation. Those are all reasons why the role of high-tech development and the development of high-tech sites is pivotal to the future attractiveness of the north-east. That is why I believe that a successful English Estate, with its management given more freedom and its funding put on a surer footing, working increasingly in partnership with the local authorities and with the new towns as they come to the end of their natural life, is one of the keys that could unlock the door to a new and more prosperous north-east.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) for his timely observations this evening, not least because the moment is approaching when we will be able to confirm, as a result of his inquiries, the decision that we can make regarding his constituency, but also because it is right to give a full airing to the undoubted benefits and advantages of industry and commerce building up their operations in the north-east. The undoubted advantages of Northumberland and Durham in particular are well worth restating at this juncture in our deliberations on English Estates.

Factory building has been an intrinsic part of successive Governments' regional policies for the past 50 years. Indeed, in the mid-1930s it was virtually the first and only form of regional assistance. Since that time a wide range of intiatives has been developed to encourage firms to set up, relocate or expand in the depressed areas of the United Kingdom. Over this time the factory building programme has evolved as an essential instrument of those policies, both complementing other measures and operating in its own right as an effective means of attracting employment to specific locations within the assisted areas.

Our policy on English Estates, and its recent record, represents an outstanding success for the Government. That is my third reason for welcoming my hon. Friend's speech.

On taking office in 1979, the Government came to the conclusion that measures intended to encourage business to set up, locate or expand in the assisted areas would not succeed if firms could not find suitable factories, workshops and offices. We asked ourselves if the private sector could be relied on to provide all the factories and industrial premises that would be needed in the assisted areas to ensure the success of our regional policies—a job it appeared to be doing quite adequately in the rest of the country. Unfortunately, it could not. Some of the investment appeared to be too high-risk and to offer too low a rate of return to attract the large amount of institutional investment needed to ensure the adequate provision of suitable premises.

Finally, we asked ourselves whether English Estates was doing the best possible job in providing these premises. I am afraid the answer to this final question was a definite no. Civil servants in Whitehall and in the region had been telling English Estates what type of property to develop and where to develop it, selected the occupants and told English Estates what rents to charge. The consequences of their decisions are still plain to see—large, echoing, empty factory sheds that provided impressive evidence of the previous Government's concern for the regions when they were being constructed, but which have stood empty since then and demonstrated that concern is not enough. The factories stand as mute evidence to a failed policy of building monuments to the past rather than workshops for the future. In order to turn equal concern for the problems of these areas into economic regeneration, it was necessary to understand industry and commerce's basic requirements for new premises. This could be done only by those versed in the disciplines of the market place.

We quickly concluded that, although it was necessary to continue the advance factory programme, it was a job for property development experts and not for civil servants to carry this programme through. We therefore strengthened the board and management of English Estates with real experts in property development, and gave it financial and commercial objectives and broad policy guidelines to which to work. It was told by us to operate in the assisted areas, building factories where there was an underlying need in the market, but only in those locations where there was no prospect of finding private sector investors to undertake the development. We told it to concentrate on the type of development that would provide the most employment and bring a better balance to local economies. It was told to sell off the property as soon as it could, either to the tenants or to private investors. It was also told to secure the maximum rent that it could, without actually turning tenants away from factories that would otherwise stand empty.

With these objectives in view, English Estates was told to plan, develop, market and manage the development programme, while exercising its best commercial judgment. The many civil servant posts previously required for this work were saved and English Estates took it on with no overall increase in its staffing level.

The policy has proved to be an outstanding success. The new team at English Estates quickly identified an underlying demand for small units; many businesses in the assisted areas could not set up or expand because there was simply nowhere for them to carry on a business. English Estates pioneered the development of small factory units and the special rental terms and management techniques necessary to attract and nurture small business tenants.

English Estates now manages over 3,000 small units and many hundreds of companies owe their existence to these English Estates developments. These companies have their roots in the assisted areas and as they grow, as many will, they will provide an increasing number of jobs firmly based in the areas where they were born. I know that my hon. Friend is most anxious that this point should be borne in mind. Growing mighty oaks from the little acorns may be a slow business, but it stands more chance of success in the longer term than attempting to transplant mighty oaks into an alien soil.

Under the old policies, English Estates was restricted to building premises for manufacturing industries. Its estates grew up without the mix of warehousing and offices that is so essential for balanced economic development at the local level. Under the Conservatives it has built warehousing and developed small suites of offices as well as factories. It has found institutional investment, up to £20 million so far, to help finance some of these developments. These units have found a ready market for businesses in the service sector that are anxious to service the manufacturing industries on the industrial estates. As a consequence, the estates are becoming more desirable locations for thriving modern industries.

Perhaps the most innovative developments of all have been those in response to this Government's policies of encouraging the interaction beween higher educational establishments and businesses engaged in the new technologies. English Estates is now the largest single high-tech developer in the country. Its technology transfer centres on university campuses provide a model which private developers have followed in the more prosperous parts of the country. At Bradford university, for example, it has provided one of the most successful high-tech developments in the United Kingdom. Similar developments have now been completed at Leeds, Hull, York and at Durham, and more are planned.

By means of this type of development, English Estates has provided a focus in the assisted areas for growth and prosperity in the industries of the future.

The policy of selling factories at every possible opportunity and getting the best rents we could from the market has paid off handsomely. As a result, English Estates returns to the Government nearly £2 from rents and factory sales for every £3 which the taxpayer invests in its programmes.

The success of the policy is demonstrated by the speed with which English Estates has filled its new units. Every one of the past five years has seen a record number of new factories occupied. The area of vacant factory space is now about half of what it was five years ago. In the north-east of England, lettings have shown a particularly encouraging trend. Not only is English Estates letting a record number of factories to new tenants there but over the past year a record number of existing tenants have expanded, creating more jobs in the process.

All this has been achieved by English Estates while operating under a hitherto bureaucratic financing system which completely divorced its commercial performance from the size and content of its development programme. The Industrial Development Act 1985 was introduced to correct this and provides the basis for a more commercial funding system. From 1 April this year English Estates will be able to use its income from rents and factory sales to fund its capital investment. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced to the House on 19 March how these new arrangements would work in practice.

As for the actual size of the programme, over the past four years we have provided an average of £32 million grant-in-aid for English Estates to invest in new factory development in the assisted areas and in recent years in Chatham. In return, English Estates has surrendered about £22 million in receipts from rents and factory sales in each of these years. On this basis, the net funding has averaged some £10 million a year. This year, English Estates will spend £31·7 million on capital investment, including about £2 million on the development in Chatham.

Next year, English Estates will spend at least £32 million on new investment but all of that will now go into the assisted areas. We have agreed to provide £12·6 million grant-in-aid towards that investment. Quite separate financing arrangements have been agreed for the development at Chatham, which will no longer effect the size of the programme that English Estates can carry out in the assisted areas. If English Estates matches its recent performance on factory sales and rents—and we have every reason to believe that it will in fact do better than that—more money should be available for it to build up a reserve for future years or to spend on more capital investment. We have high hopes that an even higher proportion of future investment will be funded from its own resources.

As for the £32 million to be spent in the assisted areas, the actual allocation to various locations within them is a matter for English Estates. It will allocate those funds to the travel-to-work areas in the assisted areas taking account of the level of unemployment in each. Those allocations have yet to be worked out, but, I am delighted to report to my hon. Friend that English Estates now has sufficient funds to undertake a £1 million development in Darlington shortly. English Estates is about to discuss with local interests how best to invest this sum to maximise job creation there.

We shall, of course, continue our policy of asking the board and management of English Estates to use their development expertise and management skills to provide the type of development that is best suited to the needs of each location in terms of generating the most jobs for the money. English Estates is now in a position to reopen negotiations and discussions with interested bodies, including the local authorities in the assisted areas, concerning the type of development that it will be undertaking in the years ahead.

It is no secret that we have discussed with the management of English Estates whether we should now go the full way and privatise its organisation. But we have come to the conclusion that the present system, with English Estates implementing our policies through the disciplines of the market place, will continue to provide the most responsive and cost-effective means of carrying out the advance factory programme.

I opened by saying that I had a success story to tell, and I would like to close by saying that we hope for even greater success under a more commercial and market-orientated system in the future. All that has been made possible by the dedication and professional expertise of the board, management and staff of English Estates.

I should like to conclude by saying that I have listened carefully to what my hon. Friend said about the future of the three development corporations and I shall, as he invited me, refer his remarks tomorrow to my colleagues at the Department of the Environment, who will, no doubt, be getting in touch shortly in response to my hon. Friend's question.

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SERVICES

Prescription Charges

1. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost of a prescription in August 1979; and what has been the percentage increase since then, taking account of his statement to the House of 10 March.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): If the hon. Gentleman is referring to the prescription charge, the charge in August 1979 was 45p, and the prescription charge in 1986-87 will be 389 per cent. higher.

Mr. Hamilton: I remind the right hon. Gentleman that since 1979 prescription charges have risen by 1,000 per cent. Need I remind him that many of the 25 per cent. who have to pay the full prescription price are on earnings only a shade above supplementary benefit level or family income supplement? In many instances people are paying not just for one prescription but for two or three. That is bound to have an adverse effect on good health. What does the Minister intend to do about it?

Mr. Hayhoe: Seventy-five per cent. of prescriptions are fully exempt and about 5 per cent., of those who require regular medication, are covered by season tickets. Less than one prescription in five attracts the full charge. The hon. Gentleman was being over-selective in suggesting that all those people are just above the limit below which they would be exempt.

Mr. Galley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the present system is nonsense? Seventy-five per cent. of the population pay no prescription charges, and whether or not payment is made bears no relation to income. If people are exempted for a particular disease, that exemption takes into account all their prescriptions. Will my right hon. Friend agree to review the whole system in the near future?

Mr. Hayhoe: The British Medical Association has recently written to me suggesting that there should be a general review. My officials will be meeting representatives of the BMA fairly soon. Certain pledges have been made about prescription and other charges; and, of course, I do not resile from those pledges.

Mr. Kirkwood: If the Minister undertakes the review, will he give urgent attention to one of the consequences of the elevenfold increase, namely, that the cost of prescriptions to the patient is more than the cost to the National Health Service? It is scandalous that nearly one third — 20 million — of the 64 million prescriptions issued cost the Government less than is charged for them.

Mr. Hayhoe: The average cost of prescriptions is somewhat over double the prescription charge; but of course within that average some will cost much more than double and others, as the hon. Gentleman has suggested, will cost less than is charged.

Parallel Drug Imports

2. Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he is proposing to take to stop unlicensed parallel drug imports.

Mr. Hayhoe: All such allegations are investigated fully. My Department is currently prosecuting two companies for alleged offences involving parallel imports. It is considering other cases where criminal proceedings will be taken if the evidence warrants this. Wholesale dealers have recently been warned that they also risk losing their licences if they market unlicensed medicinal products. Lists of parallel imported products which have been granted licences have been issued to help pharmacists identify products offered to them.

Mr. Morris: That is a reasonable beginning. Is my right hon. Friend aware that the number of scrips at present met by parallel imports is about 7 per cent.? The cost to the nation is just over £100 million and there is a loss to the Exchequer of about £30 million or £40 million in terms of remuneration to pharmacists, tax, and so on. Is he further aware that although only two companies have been prosecuted there is clear evidence that tens of companies are slapping labels on to certain products and producing other products of different colours and shapes? Should not more urgent action be taken by the Department to deal with this matter?

Mr. Hayhoe: If my hon. Friend has evidence, I hope that he will let my Department have it, and I hope that those who advise and give information to him about these matters will do likewise. My hon. Friend will realise that what was called the high discount scheme that was introduced by my predecessor was challenged and declared to be contrary to European law. My officials and I are urgently considering what further action may be possible to recover excessive discounts.

Sir Dudley Smith: Is my right hon. Friend aware that although he rightly demands the highest quality for the production and labelling of British medicines, he does not appear to be doing the same for foreign, imported products? Why not?.

Mr. Hayhoe: My hon. Friend is wrong to suggest that there is a reduction in the requirements relating to labelling and quality. I repeat that anybody who markets an imported, unlicensed medicine may be liable to prosecution for committing an offence under the Medicines Act 1985.

Social Security Reform

3. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the future role of the voluntary sector following the publication of the Green Paper and the White Paper on the reform of social security; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): A number of voluntary organisations have written in about how the Green and White Paper proposals will affect them. Some have subsequently discussed their views with me and other Ministers.

Mr. Colvin: What role does my hon. Friend envisage for the voluntary sector in a reformed welfare state, particularly in the light of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's recent Budget recommendations on changes in the tax regime for voluntary charitable giving?

Mr. Newton: I expect that the measures that were announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which I very much welcome, will enable the voluntary organisations to play an even more important part in the general welfare of the community than they already play. It is a contribution which in its own humble way the Department of Health and Social Security will seek to promote by its grants and policies.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Minister confirm that as part of this change the Government do not intend to transfer any statutory responsibility from either the social services or the health services to the voluntary sector?

Mr. Newton: There is no proposal to transfer responsibilities between the sectors. The hon. Gentleman knows that one of our major aims is to promote partnership between the two, because we believe that that is the best way to meet the needs of many people.

Mr. Stern: Is my hon. Friend aware that local authorities in certain areas are using Government policies, such as care in the community, to reduce the role of the voluntary sector? Will he issue guidance in areas where there have been major changes in social policy to encourage existing voluntary groups and new voluntary groups to take a full part?

Mr. Newton: We shall do everything that we can to ensure the success of the partnership to which I have referred. Experience differs from one local authority to another. Alongside those to which my hon. Friend has referred are others which are accused of trying to push more on to the voluntary sector. A proper partnership remains the right answer.

Mr. Meacher: Does it not say a good deal about this Government's policies that a week ago a Tory Budget yet again gave away major tax concessions to the rich by abolishing the tax even on major lifetime gifts and by further big tax cuts for directors on £30,000 a year, but that at the same time the Social Security Bill will cut the benefit of 2,500 very severely disabled people by no less than £60 a week and also, by major changes to the disregards, will cut the income of voluntary support workers and of those who care for them? Is it not absolutely and abundantly clear that social security reform under this Government is simply a fig leaf for redistribution from the poor to the rich?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman is increasingly stuck in a very boring groove. He knows quite well that the illustrative figures published with the White Paper show that the overwhelming majority of the least well-off disabled people will gain substantially.

Health Education Officers

4. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further action he proposes to take on the report "The Recruitment, Training and Development of Health Education Officers".

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): The report was reconsidered last year under the aegis of the National Health Service Training Authority, and new arrangements to oversee the training of health education officers are now being examined by the authority, the Health Education Council and the Department.

Mr. Dormand: I recognise the fine work that is done by the Health Education Council, but does the Minister agree that health education officers play a crucial role? Will the Minister clarify what he said? Does he mean that the Kirby committee will be reconvened? If not, will he consider reconvening that committee, because so much remains to be done with regard to the recruitment, training and development of health education officers? I hope that that will be done soon.

Mr. Whitney: I am happy to reaffirm that the Department recognises the necessary role of health education officers. I assure the hon. Gentleman that progress to improve the training of these officers is going apace.

Mr. Kennedy: I am an ashamed smoker who is still trying to give up, but failing abysmally. In view of the announcements that were made yesterday by the Department about the extra action to be taken against the promotion of cigarette smoking, I put it to the Minister that the balance between the funds that the Health Education Council enjoys and the amounts that the tobacco companies can spend on advertising should be substantially redressed. If that is not done the Department's action will be no more than a cosmetic exercise. Will the Minister take steps to redress that balance?

Mr. Whitney: Our record on reducing smoking is good. This subject will be covered by later questions on the Order Paper.

Mr. Key: Does my hon. Friend agree that the role of the Health Education Council must extend into areas of drug and substance abuse? Action should start with young children of primary school age. Does he accept that it is time we stopped the idea that by telling people about drugs we shall enhance their interest in them? Finally, does my hon. Friend agree that we must achieve a completely different attitude in young people from primary school age?

Mr. Whitney: Both the Health Education Council and the Department are active in this area. I commend to my hon. Friend the excellent videos, for use in schools, which we released some weeks ago.

Orthopaedic Operations

5. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average length of time patients have to wait for orthopaedic operations.

Mr. Hayhoe: In 1983 the estimated median interval between placement on a waiting list and admission for orthopaedic surgery was 13 weeks.

Dr. Marek: Is the Minister aware that, for example, in the West Surrey and North-East Hampshire district health authority — the figures are not untypical — the waiting list for orthopaedic operations in December 1983 was 1,027 and in 1985 it was 1,350? That is an increase of 30 per cent. Is he further aware that the waiting time in that district health authority is four to five years? Therefore, does the Minister agree that his figures are fiddled and gerrymandered in the same way as the figures that his Department produced about the so-called growth in the Health Service? The National Health Service, far from being safe in his hands, is dust and ashes in them. It is a disgraceful situation. What does the Minister intend to do about it?

Mr. Hayhoe: It is clear that the hon. Gentleman has been carefully selective in his choice of figures, which may or may not be accurate. Between 1978 and 1984, in the trauma and orthopaedic specialty, there have been 75,000 extra cases coming forward—an increase of 17 per cent. The waiting lists, despite that increased load, have remained the same. Perhaps the most important aspect is that the waiting lists for urgent treatment have come down by 14 per cent. compared with the position under the Labour Government.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: Does my right hon. Friend think that the private sector can assist in reducing waiting lists, and to what extent is it used to do that?

Mr. Hayhoe: Health authorities have freedom to make arrangements with the private sector if it makes cost-effective sense to do so. I know that that has been done to advantage in particular areas.

Dr. Roger Thomas: What progress is being made in improving the orthopaedic consultant-registrar proportion, as recommended by the Select Committee three years ago? Has progress been retarded by the new, more stringent rules regarding immigrant doctors staying in this country?

Mr. Hayhoe: The new and, as the hon. Gentleman said, more stringent rules that apply to immigrant doctors in the NHS are being warmly welcomed as making a positive contribution to solving the long-standing problem of medical manpower. I am consulting the professions on these issues. I hope that we shall make real progress in resolving what has been a long-standing problem.

Mrs. Currie: Is my right hon. Friend aware that some of my constituents in South Derbyshire have been worried by the recent statements of orthopaedic surgeons working at the local hospital in Burton-on-Trent? May I convey to my right hon. Friend the fact that the surgeons are saying that orthopaedic posts cannot be filled in our local hospital because of the Government's ruling on overseas doctors, that money is available and posts exist, but that the home-grown version will not come to our part of the world? Does he agree that that is absolute nonsense, and will he look into the matter?

Mr. Hayhoe: I am not aware of the position to which my hon. Friend refers. My superficial reaction is that that does not make sense, because those restrictions do not apply at present, but they will apply some time in future.

Mr. Pavitt: Is the Minister aware that at a hospital not far from the Chamber the waiting list for a hip replacement operation is 5¼ years? Is he further aware that the rationalisation of acute beds in district general hospitals meant that last week a teaching hospital telephoned 13 hospitals to take an emergency case, and that only the fourteenth had a bed available? This is a crisis. Will the Minister do something about it?

Mr. Hayhoe: I am well aware that compared with the position under the Labour Government — [Interruption.] I realise that the Labour party does not like these comparisons being made, but it ill befits it to criticise us when its performance was so much worse. There has been an increase of about 33 per cent in the number of hip replacement operations being carried out, and the average or median waiting time for that operation is the same now as it was then, despite the significant increase in the numbers being operated upon.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Is it not misleading to refer to the average waiting time for orthopaedic operations when some are so minor that waiting is no hardship, while others are so painful that treatment is urgently required? Is it not true that to have an average covering those two categories is wholly misleading?

Mr. Hayhoe: I was giving not averages but medians. [Laughter.] With my engineering background I like to be precise about these matters. The figure that I gave meant that 50 per cent. of people were waiting fewer than 13 weeks and 50 per cent. were waiting longer. That accurately reflects the queues waiting for operations. My hon. Friend is right, and that is why I said that the number of urgent cases on the waiting list had been reduced by 14 per cent. compared with the figure when we came to power in May 1979.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is not one aspect of the problem that the more glamorous, hi-tech operations command a higher proportion of the available resources than their prognosis would warrant—for example, compared with hip replacement operations? What is happening to the idea of a medical audit which would examine the relative prognoses of such operations? Will the Minister ensure that hip replacement operations, which give people much greater activity and pleasure, are carried out, as the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) said earlier, without the huge waiting lists that exist in my area, as much as in the hon. Gentleman's area?

Mr. Hayhoe: I said that the number of hip replacements had increased significantly since the party that the hon. Gentleman supported in the Division Lobbies and sustained in office was in power. Having said that, of course the hon. Gentleman is right to raise the wider question. The whole of the medical profession ought to be looking at that question so that a proper balanced judgment can be made. It is certainly not for politicians to impose judgments upon the professions in that area.

Diabetics

6. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has had any representations recently from or on behalf of diabetics about the provision of medical services to them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The Department is in frequent contact with the British Diabetic Association about its concerns.

Mr. Hirst: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his short reply. Amid all the controversy about whether needles should be made available to drug addicts to prevent the spread of disease, is he aware of the continuing concern of diabetics that disposable syringes and blood glucose monitoring equipment remain unavailable on prescription? As the parent of a young diabetic daughter, may I remind my hon. Friend of the difficulties that a young child has in learning how to inject herself with the large glass syringe supplied by the National Health Service? Can he offer any hope of a relaxation of the prescription availability rules?

Mr. Whitney: We are well aware of the points that my hon. Friend has made. If either of those services is clinically necessary, it is available through the hospital service. However, we are sympathetically considering whether GPs might be able to prescribe home blood glucose tests. Of course, that has important resource implications which must be balanced against other demands on the National Health Service.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Does that mean that the Minister is consenting to ambulatory automatic delivery of insulin to diabetics? Will there be better treatment for the blind diabetic?

Mr. Whitney: I cannot go beyond what I have said. We are considering extremely carefully the improvement of the service, but, where it is clinically necessary, such services are available through the hospital service.

Mr. Robert Atkins: I endorse the request made by my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst). As the parent of a diabetic child, I know at first hand the problems that are involved. For example, a young child, particularly a girl, can be bruised most severely by using a usable as opposed to a reusable syringe. To that extent, will my hon. Friend give what attention he can to considering the point that I have raised as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Whitney: Yes, I certainly will. However, where it is clinically necessary, that provision is still available through the hospital service and my hon. Friend may wish to consider that in his own case.

Disabled Persons (Services Consultation and Representation) Bill

7. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, following his consultation exercise on the Disabled Persons (Services Consultation and Representation) Bill, the Government will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards its enactment.

Mr. Hayhoe: I made the Government's attitude clear on Second Reading. The Government are still considering the responses to the consultation paper issued last month. I hope to be able to announce our conclusions shortly.

Mr. Clarke: Is the Minister aware that the views that he expressed on Second Reading have found no support? Does he accept that proper assessments and crisis prevention actually save money, apart from being socially desirable? Most important of all, now that he knows that the response to the Government's document was overwhelmingly in favour of every clause in the Bill, will he accept that finding and refuse to dilute it?

Mr. Hayhoe: I know that the consultations have shown that the resource implications of the Bill and of the proposed amendments to the Bill are considerable. I suggested that that was the case when I spoke on Second Reading.

Mr. Hannam: If my right hon. Friend is facing severe resource limitations in connection with this very worthwhile Bill, will he consider a phased programme of introduction of some of the key provisions of the Bill, especially those affecting the assessment and representation of disabled people?

Mr. Hayhoe: That point has been put to me during the consultation period. As I have said, the Government are considering the responses that were given during that period.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Does the Minister recall that, perhaps because of, rather than in spite of, his speech the Bill received an unopposed Second Reading? Is he aware that throughout the country there is massive support for the Bill? Why will the Government not accept those democratic decisions and realise that if the will is there the resources can be found?

Mr. Hayhoe: Resources require a little more than will. I know how easy it is for the Opposition to suggest additional expenditure, which presumably would be on top of the £24 billion to which they are already committed.

Mr. Dykes: Does my right hon. Friend intend pursuing through his ministerial colleagues in the Department of Transport discussions with London Regional Transport about converting tube stations to make them suitable for use by disabled persons?

Mr. Hayhoe: I do not think that that matter is directly relevant to the private Member's Bill which we are considering, but I shall certainly take account of my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Ashley: Will the right hon. Gentleman take this opportunity to repudiate the extraordinary view that the Budget concessions for charities make it more difficult for people to argue for the Bill? Will he acknowledge that the Bill is concerned with statutory services and that the Budget concessions have nothing whatsoever to do with those services?

Mr. Hayhoe: One must consider resources in relation to the whole of Government activity—the ability, or lack of ability, to raise taxation, and the ability to spend, or not to spend, as the case may be. It is difficult to make the sort of sharp differentiations to which the right hon. Gentleman refers.

Mr. Rowe: Does my right hon. Friend accept that many Conservative Members have great sympathy with his views in not wanting to put on the statute book provisions that cannot be met out of resources? Given the enormous support for the Bill, will my right hon. Friend take great care not to cripple it? Will he have a word with my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General, who seems to believe that the scope for using the community programme and other programmes within the Health Service is much more limited than it really is? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Bill gives us an opportunity to make those programmes effective?

Mr. Hayhoe: As I made clear on Second Reading and in Committee, I am anxious not to support anything that would be unduly bureaucratic or entail undue administrative costs. The hon. Member for Monklands, West, (Mr. Clarke) acknowledged in introducing the Bill the difficulties in providing the substantial extra resources involved in the Bill's provisions.

Mr. Alfred Morris: The right hon. Gentleman has heard from both sides of the House of the deep concern about the Government's attitude to this humane and much needed Bill. Why does he still appear to insist that he knows better than virtually all the voluntary, professional, health and local authority organisations he consulted? They overwhelmingly backed the Bill and opposed the Government's neutering amendments. "Cynical", "hurried and ill-conceived" and "mean and short-sighted" are but a few of their very strong criticisms of the Government's intention to take whole clauses out of the Bill and to water down others. How can the right hon. Gentleman possibly justify that intention?

Mr. Hayhoe: I notice that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was reading out a prepared statement in the guise of asking a supplementary question. He knows, but did not acknowledge, that the local authority associations have made it clear from the start that there are substantial resource implications in the Bill. That is a matter of concern to them and to the Government.

Nurses (Residential Accommodation)

9. Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the proposals he has received from regional health authorities to evict nurses from residential accommodation in order to realise assets for National Health Service funding.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): Authorities have been asked to prepare plans showing how many units of staff accommodation they propose to provide from the beginning of 1988. The Department is currently discussing these plans, some only in draft form, with the 14 regional health authorities.

Mr. Pavitt: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that some health authorities are jumping the gun and that some nurses have already been given notice that they may be evicted? Is he aware that, under the 1977 legislation, nurses have the security of tenure which is given to other tenants? Is the right hon. Gentleman making money available so that these cases can be taken to the magistrates' courts? If such cases arise in Fulham before 10 April, will he go to the magistrates' court to evict the nurses?

Mr. Fowler: I think that the last point is a ludicrous mis-statement of what the policy is all about. What health authorities are doing is to review their stock of accommodation. It follows an examination which suggested that one fifth of National Health Service accommodation was standing empty. That is a totally indefensible position. Therefore, what we are doing is seeking to have a policy which uses National Health Service accommodation. What I have made clear, and what I repeat, is that special protection will be given to nurses in training.

Mr. Onslow: While I do not disagree with my right hon. Friend that there should be no waste in this sector of the Health Service any more than in any other, when the plans put forward by regional health authorities to help a district clearly do not take full account of the actual circumstances in that health district, will my right hon. Friend give instructions that they should be withdrawn for reconsideration?

Mr. Fowler: Yes, Sir. This is the whole purpose of what we are seeking to do. Ministers and the Department will review the plans that come up before they are put into operation.

Mr. Freeson: Why is the Minister fudging answers to this question? Is it not the case that it is Government policy for health authorities to dispose of all these properties, or as many of them as possible, and that action is being taken now? Will he ensure that that kind of policy is not given support by the Department in future and, if there are to be disposals of property in some cases, that the land and property in question are in the first instance offered to local authorities and other bodies, which provide much-needed services for areas in need?

Mr. Fowler: The right hon. Gentleman has entirely mis-stated the policy. What we are saying to health authorities is that if the property is not used, for example, if it is standing empty, it should be sold. Even the right hon. Gentleman might agree with that policy. We will protect the position of nurses in training and we will sell that accommodation to those who are living in it at special discount rates. In addition, we will put the proceeds of these sales to the benefit of the Health Service, and that is surely a sensible thing to do.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Is it not inappropriate for the National Health Service to behave in large measure like a housing authority, too often looking after accommodation which is under-utilised, poorly maintained and badly organised? Is he aware that in my own area, where housing policies have been reviewed, many long-standing tenants have been able to buy their own property, and other property has been sold off, thus releasing resources to improve nurses' accommodation?

Mr. Fowler: I entirely agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said. The fact is that the proceeds will go to health authorities. The first call on those proceeds will be to improve nurses' accommodation. The proceeds will also be used to improve the capital stock. Under this Government, in 1981 we released about £19 million from the sale of land and buildings to the benefit of the Health Service. Next year, that figure will be over £130 million —all to the benefit of the Health Service.

Mr. Dobson: Aside from all the waffle, will the Secretary of State guarantee that no district health authority will resort to the courts to force nurses to leave accommodation in which they wish to remain?

Mr. Fowler: I can give that guarantee. I would ask the hon. Gentleman, aside from his prejudice, to look at the policy and at the impact and effect that it will have upon developing services and facilities in the Health Service.

Smoking

10. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will take steps to seek to reduce the level of smoking among schoolchildren and young persons.

Mr. Fowler: We are currently spending £1 million in two television regions on a test campaign designed specifically to persuade young people not to smoke. In addition, the new voluntary agreement which I have reached with the tobacco industry includes specific measures designed to protect young people.

Mr. Janner: Does the Minister not appreciate that these measures are pathetic and inadequate to meet what remains the plague of smoking by young people? How many people in the country died of tobacco-related diseases last year, how many of them started when they were youngsters, and when will he ban tobacco advertising?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. and learned Gentleman will see from the steps announced yesterday that we are taking further steps to seek to dissuade young people particularly from taking up smoking. There is nothing between us in that respect. I believe that the agreement which we have reached will, in its many details, effect that purpose.

Mr. Sims: Is my right hon. Friend aware that while the agreement does not go as far as some of us would like, it is welcome as far as it goes, particularly in the emphasis that it puts on dissuading children and young people from taking up smoking? Is he satisfied that the provisions in the new agreement are adequate to control the practice of tobacco companies using their name to promote leisurewear, sportswear, concerts and holidays, all of which are aimed at the youth market?

Mr. Fowler: Yes. There is further work to be done about sports sponsorship and sponsorship of that sort, but we are seeking to control that as far as we can. The 10 points on which we have reached agreement will have the effect of further reducing smoking.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Will the right hon. Gentleman please answer the question posed to him by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner). The right hon. Gentleman has the figures. How many people died last year of tobacco-related diseases?

Mr. Fowler: One of the warnings gives the answer to that. The hon. Gentleman can see for himself that more than 30,000 people die each year in the United Kingdom from lung cancer. That will be one of the new warnings on cigarette packets. That is right.

Mr. Bellingham: Is my right hon. Friend aware that one of the main reasons for the big increase in smoking in schools is the reluctance and inability of headmasters to apply the necessary sanctions? What advice will my right hon. Friend give to headmasters?

Mr. Fowler: That is one part of it, but we can help in other parts by the restrictions that we are putting on poster advertising, by the other restrictions that will take place, and by the advertising that the tobacco industry itself is carrying out to dissuade retailers from selling cigarettes to young children under the age of 16.

Ms. Harman: Is the Secretary of State aware of the growing concern about the sale of Skoal Bandits, a tobacco substance sold for chewing? Is he aware that his chief medical officer has said that Skoal Bandits can cause disfigurement or death among children? Is he aware of the evidence from America which shows that the chewing of Skoal Bandits by children can cause cancer of the tongue, lips and mouth? Instead of seeking voluntary agreement, which clearly has not worked in America, will he ban the sale of Skoal Bandits to children?

Mr. Fowler: The same kind of restrictions apply to the advertising of Skoal Bandits as to the advertising of cigarettes in general. We are considering the evidence provided in the BBC's "That's Life" programme on Sunday — [Interruption] — which suggested that the advertising agreement had not been taken into account. Of course, we are concerned and shall seek to act on that.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to listen to the questions and the answers.

Health Service Pay

11. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement as to his policy on Health Service pay.

Mr. Fowler: The review bodies covering doctors, nurses and other professional groups have taken evidence and will report to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. The ancillary staffs Whitley Council discussed this year's pay claim at its meeting on 13 March. Other negotiations will also follow.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is there not poverty pay among Britain's NHS ancillary workers? Is it not true that male ancillary workers in the National Health Service earn £40 per week less than the national average manual worker and that women in a similar position earn £65 less? When decisions are taken by 1 April, may we have an assurance that the gap will be closed by the Government?

Mr. Fowler: The first meeting of the ancillary staff side part of the Whitley council took place on 13 March, at that meeting the management side put forward a proposal which could lead to a major revision of the existing grade structure. I am glad to say that the staff side welcomed that in principle and that negotiations will continue on it.

Mr. Meacher: Is the Secretary of State aware that a ward sister with major patient responsibility now gets less pay than a freshly recruited police constable of 19? Is he aware that the maximum that a staff nurse can earn is less than the minimum amount received by the lowest paid constable? Will he give an assurance that in the current negotiations he will rectify this manifest iniquity and will he also publicly repudiate the use of blackmail in saying that any above-inflation increase in nurses' pay will be taken back by cuts in services to patients?

Mr. Fowler: There is no question of blackmail. The hon. Gentleman will agree that there have been two years during which nurses have had above-average increases.

This Government set up an independent review body for nurses, which the nursing profession wanted for years. We provided that, and we were right to do so.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Terry Fields asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 March.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Mr. Fields: Does the Prime Minister recall her words in the Budget debate on 19 April 1961 and her outright condemnation of share speculation? Do not those words ring hollow today in view of the arrogant disregard—[Interruption.]—of the conventions of this House by a Prime Minister abusing that office in her dealings for five years in undisclosed shares? May we have an assurance that when the district auditors have finished investigating honest politicians in Liverpool and Lambeth they will open up the books of the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order. First, that was a very long question, and, secondly, I could easily hear it.

The Prime Minister: In reply to the hon. Gentleman —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister heard the question.

The Prime Minister: I have scrupulously observed the long-standing convention governing the holding of shares by Ministers. These conventions are set out in a memorandum by the former Secretary of the Cabinet, which has been in the Library of the House since 1975. Under those conventions there is nothing which requires me, on assuming office, to dispose of my shares or to transfer them into a trust or into the name of investment managers.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Is it not a concept worthy of George Orwell that the only new idea that the official Opposition had during Budget week was to promise us all free burglar alarms——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Questions must relate to the Prime Minister.

Sir Peter Tapsell: —particularly bearing in mind that the tax policies of the Labour party are designed to turn burglary itself into a nationalised industry?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that my hon. Friend's question was very pertinent. My only comment on the Budget is that the Opposition were not prepared to condemn the reduction in the standard rate of income tax by one penny, and yet were not prepared to vote for it.

Mr. Kinnock: I understand that the Foreign Office will not make a statement in the House today about the incident yesterday in the Gulf of Sidra. May I therefore ask the Prime Minister whether she agrees that her Government's response to the atrocities, to the attacks on British citizens and to the United States proposal in January for economic sanctions against Libya has been a great deal more rational and responsible than the dangerous and destabilising attacks on Libya yesterday by American forces?

Can the right hon. Lady further tell me what view her Government expressed in the United States when they were informed of its intention to carry out naval exercises in the Gulf of Sidra some weeks ago? Finally, are United Kingdom citizens in Libya being advised to take any additional precautions in the wake of yesterday's incidents?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is referring to the Gulf of Sirte. Let me make it clear that United States ships and aircraft were operating in international waters and airspace and that they have every right so to do. It is important that international waters and airspace be kept open, and we support the right of the United States so to operate.

Mr. Kinnock: The rights of the United States navy to be in international waters are not in question in the House, and certainly nobody could or should accept Gaddafi's definition of what are international waters in the Gulf of Sidra, which is the same place as the right hon. Lady mentioned, as, she should know. What is in question is the United States judgment in exercising those rights. Does she not think that, in view of the destabilising effect of the exchange, it is appropriate for the British Prime Minister to express an opinion that is slightly more assertive than that which she has expressed so far?

The Prime Minister: I have expressed a clear opinion, and shall express it again. It is important that international waters and airspace be kept open. The United States was operating in international waters and airspace and we support its right to operate that way. Its planes were attacked by missiles. The missiles did not hit. In pursuance of article 51 of the United Nations charter, the United States is entitled to act in self-defence against such attacks.

Mr. Fletcher: Will my right hon. Friend accept that only the Opposition Benches would suggest that her personal conduct requires any investigation? Will she also accept that the Conservative Benches and the country have every confidence in her personal integrity?

The Prime Minister: The rules can be read in the Library of the House, I made my position clear. When specific scandalous, scurrilous and totally false allegations were made outside the House, I answered outside the House in meticulous detail to show that the allegations were completely unfounded and outrageous.

Q2. Mr. Wallace asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wallace: Is the Prime Minister aware that I have received many representations from parents of children from two schools in my constituency—Symbister junior high in Shetland and St. Margaret's Hope in Orkney—about the state of those schools? One was described as dangerous and unsanitary, and the other as being a fire risk? Does she accept that for pupils to study day in and day out in such schools is as adverse to their education as any number of industrial disputes? How can she justify policies which allow our children to be educated in schools of such damaged fabric when so many people are unemployed, particularly in the construction industry?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, education policy is either for the Secretary of State for Scotland, as the authority which decides upon capital grants, or for his local education authority. He should pursue the matter with them as a matter of priority.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Science and Engineering Research Council intends to remove the Royal Greenwich Observatory from Herstmonceaux in my constituency? Will she encourage the council to consider the impact of its decision on local tourism and ask it to demonstrate how that would be a cost-effective use of millions of pounds of research funds?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, it was the decision of the Science and Engineering Research Council to move the astronomy facilities from Herstmonceaux to one of three other places. It is consulting widely and will consult my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science before a final move is made. I know that it will be painful for those who live near Herstmonceaux if that decision were taken, and I must make it clear that there could be no removal from Herstmonceaux elsewhere before 1990. The consultations will take place, the opinion of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science will be sought and he will also consult the Department of the Environment before any decision is taken.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: In the course of her busy day, will the Prime Minister spare a thought for the people of Tyneside, and in particular the owners, management and work force of Swan Hunter shipbuilders? We are grateful for the interest which the Prime Minister is taking in the placement of the auxiliary oil replenishment vessel. The very future of our community on Tyneside depends upon it. Will the Prime Minister personally intervene to ensure that that order is committed to Swan Hunter and that the shipbuilding industry on the Tyne can survive?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, all Members who represent that part of the country, and, of course, those who are responsible for the rival shipyard in Northern Ireland, are making a very strong case that limited orders should go to their own yards. He will be aware that it is important that the orders should go to the place that has put in the most effective value-for-money tender. It will have to be considered mainly on that basis, and of course the matter is receiving a great deal of attention from my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry, forNorthern Ireland and for Defence. I have nothing further at the moment to say to the hon. Gentleman and those who take the view that he does.

Q3. Mr. Stokes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stokes: My right hon. Friend will know of the great importance of British Leyland in my constituency and in many other neighbouring constituencies. Without referring specifically to the statement this afternoon, will she state in general that the Government's policy is either to merge or to sell constituent parts of BL to those who can make good—probably very good—profits, thus ensuring the long-term future of both employees and suppliers? Will she also state categorically that bids from the United States of America will not be turned down under what The Times calls today "perverse patriotism"?

The Prime Minister: Yes of course it is this Government's policy to secure in the end the privatisation of British Leyland. With that in mind we were making contacts to see whether we could have the privatisation of BL Trucks, Land Rover, Leyland and Freight Rover. My hon. Friend must await the statement, but I make it absolutely clear that we are concerned that there should be a prosperous industry with good prospects for the future for the people who work in it. We are concerned that some day it should be able to stand on its own feet without making extra demands on the taxpayer. Like other firms, it has to run without subsidy.

Q4. Mr. Beith asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Beith: In seeking the best value for money in the AOR vessel contract, will the Prime Minister bear in mind that if Swan Hunter were to underestimate its costs it would be the shareholders who would pay, but that if Harland and Wolff were to underestimate its costs it might be the taxpayer who would be expected to bail it out as a nationalised yard?

The Prime Minister: All hon. Members who have made representations to me have made it very clear that we must watch very carefully to ensure that there is no element of cross-subsidisation in any bid. We are taking that very much into account and having a look at the detailed figures.

Mr. Franks: As the Prime Minister has been invited to consider individual shareholdings, may I invite her to consider the individual shareholdings of 11,400 employees in the Vickers shipyard, representing over 81 per cent. of the total work force, who have applied to buy shares in the company?

The Prime Minister: Yes, this is popular capitalism at work, which has no place in Labour party policy. I wish it well in the allocation of shares to them and in the future of their shipyard.

Q5. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Prime Minister find time to consider the inquiry into the case of Isabel Schwartz, the social worker who was killed by her mentally ill client, who had been released into the community without adequate assessment of her needs? Does this case not graphically illustrate the need for the Disabled Persons (Services Consultation and Representation) Bill to be passed? Is the Prime Minister aware that if it had been passed in 1982, Isabel Schwartz might be alive today?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the Government's view of the Bill is that it should be turned into a workable Bill that will not put too many extra burdens on local authorities. We are particularly aware of the concerns, which the hon. Gentleman has mentioned, about these terrible tragedies. We shall do everything that we can to try to avoid them.

Q6. Ms. Clare Short asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Ms. Short: Does the Prime Minister agree with the majority of women in Britain, and with many men, that pictures of naked women in mass circulation newspapers should be made illegal?

The Prime Minister: The Obscene Publications Act would already apply if the hon. Lady has any complaints to make.

Mr. Pavitt: On a point of order arising out of questions, Mr. Speaker. During Question Time, you will have heard a number of references to a voluntary agreement between the tobacco industry and the Minister for Health. I tried to see a copy of that agreement in the Library this morning, but hon. Members have not had the opportunity to see it. Can you give instructions so that such a copy can be placed in the Library, so that we can see what has been decided?

Mr. Speaker: This is a matter for the Minister, but I am sure that the Front Bench will have heard the hon. Gentleman's request.

Mr. Terry Fields: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for members of the Arthur Daley tendency on the Conservative Benches to seek to muzzle genuine questions to the Prime Minister on a matter of national importance by their——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman had an opportunity to ask his question. I do not think that he was muzzled. I intervened to give him some protection.

British Leyland

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): As the House is aware, BL and the Government have been in discussion with several companies about the privatisation of the main Land Rover-Leyland businesses. Of these, General Motors has made proposals concerning Leyland Trucks, Freight Rover and Land Rover.

In relation to the truck and van sectors, the talks with GM concentrated on the possibilities for combining the respective Leyland and Bedford businesses, to the mutual benefit of GM and BL. In respect of Land Rover, where there are opportunities for Land Rover in expanding European and world markets, the Government were determined that, as a condition of privatisation, special arrangements should be concluded to safeguard UK interests, including a measure of real UK control over the future of the business. For its part, however, GM wished to have effective control of the company from the outset and an assurance of full ownership and control within a relatively short period, and it became clear that it was not able to compromise on these points. Despite the view taken of the GM proposal by the BL board from its commercial standpoint, this was not a basis for an agreement acceptable to the Government in the national interest.

GM has stated that it is not willing to proceed with an arrangement for Leyland Trucks and Freight Rover which excludes the Land Rover company. Therefore, the talks have been ended.

The BL board will give further study to the alternative ways forward for all the businesses concerned. For Leyland Trucks, which operates in a depressed and fiercely competitive market, the board will continue to examine the possibilities for collaboration with other manufacturers and other ways to sustain its improving trend in performance. The Government continue to support the commercial development of this business, in accordance with established plans. For Land Rover and Freight Rover, the board will include in its examination the various expressions of interest which have already been announced, with a view to recommending the course most likely to achieve the privatisation of the businesses in a way which best secures their future.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): Does the Secretary of State recognise that he has today announced the collapse of a venture that was ill-conceived in purpose, anti-British in effect and handled with almost unbelievable incompetence? Now that the Secretary of State has confirmed the ending of the talks, can he say that this is the final end of this discredited proposal? Can we exclude any notion of selling valuable parts of British Leyland to its competitors?

The Secretary of State will also no doubt recollect that only a few weeks ago he was standing at the Dispatch Box stating confidently that assurances could be given by General Motors to satisfy all United Kingdom interests. He was insisting on a sharp deadline for the submission of bids, so urgent was the matter that had to be determined.

Is it the case that, in the discussions that have just ended, the Government at one stage proposed that General Motors acquire 49 per cent. of Land Rover, with an option to increase its shareholding as time, and no doubt public opinion, passed on? What was the role of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in those discussions? Is it not the case that he initiated the secret talks 18 months ago? Despite that, did he not elbow the Secretary of State aside in those discussions and, fearful of the political consequences of what he had initially proposed, bring the talks to an end?

Can we now be assured by the Secretary of State that there will be no question, during the lifetime of the Government, of Land Rover or any other part of the British Leyland Group passing out of British control? Is the Secretary of State aware that it is only the strongly expressed voice of Parliament and people that forced the Government to change direction on this issue?

Will the Government now consider apologising to the British Leyland group for the damaging commercial uncertainty which this whole affair has cost them, including the damage to the Austin Rover group caused by the Ford talks, which were also brought to an end by the voice of Parliament and people? Do the Government realise that, in hanging a "for sale" notice over the premises, they have been culpably negligent in their stewardship of a crucial part of British industry?

The Secretary of State says that the Government will continue to support the commercial development of Leyland Trucks in accordance with established plans. Since it is the established plans which have led us to this pass, is it not time to revise them? Can I suggest that the Government, for once, give proper backing to Leyland Trucks? Why do they not compliment it on its commercial success and stand behind it? Can the Secretary of State tell me whether it is true that the British Leyland board stopped the Austin Rover group putting advertisements in the British newspapers about the success of its ambitions because they ran contrary to the Government's then policy? I should like the Secretary of State to give me a specific answer to that question.

I have one final question to put to the Secretary of State. Since we are now in a fast-moving situation, can the House be given an assurance that there will be no further announcement about any sale of British Leyland before the House returns from the Easter recess? Can we be assured that, before any further moves are made, there will be a full debate in the House so that hon. Members in all parts of the House can express their opinions upon it?

Mr. Channon: I have seldom, if ever, heard a more exaggerated set of questions than that. I shall deal with the points the right hon. and learned Gentleman has raised in his exaggerated questions. I can assure him that no decisions will be taken about any of these matters before the House returns from the Easter recess. As to the question of a debate, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has already told the House the Government's position on that, and it remains unchanged.

As to the other questions raised by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I have always made it clear to the House, at least I hope I have, that we wanted adequate assurances before we would be prepared to sell Land Rover to General Motors. There might have been a compromise. That is certainly something that was discussed. But it was quite impossible to reach a situation in which General Motors insisted on having effective control of the company and an assurance of full ownership and control within a relatively short period. I could not recommend that to my colleagues or the House, and I think that that was right.

We shall continue with the established plans for trucks, which are already known. I hope that the BL board will now be considering all the options available to it, and will make recommendations to me. The Government will then consider them in the normal way.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the fact that GM has pulled out means that Leyland Trucks, with its successful recent record in terms of its product, price and market share, will now need further investment from the Government and the taxpayer, just as other successful companies, such as British Aerospace have merited and gained such investment in recent years. Might not the partisan and short-sighted barriage of questions and statements from the Opposition have done more harm to the future and jobs of those working in Leyland Trucks than GM could ever do? Will my right hon. Friend resist the suggestion to hold an urgent debate on British Leyland, as that will do nothing more than exacerbate the problems which he is trying so hard to resolve?

Mr. Channon: I have already said that the Government will continue to support the commercial development of the truck business in accordance with the established plans. Of course the future of Leyland Trucks will be a matter for the board to consider in the normal way, and it will also come forward with proposals in the normal way. At present, there is no suggestion of any further equity being needed for Leyland Trucks or any other part of the Leyland business.

I cannot see any purpose in holding a debate until we have something to debate and until I have recommendations to put to the House.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Does the Secretary of State agree that GM has a legitimate grievance in that, when it was first propositioned by his predecessor — now the chairman of the Conservative Party—in mid-1984, to take over the whole lot, no such conditions were attached to his eagerness to be rid of British Leyland's commercial vehicles? Conditions have been imposed only as a result of quite proper pressure in the House during the past few weeks. Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that representations are being made by Austin Rover retailers, because the damaging uncertainty hanging over the future of British Leyland as a whole is affecting showroom sales? Will he make it his business to restore calm in the future of BL as soon as possible?

Mr. Channon: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster publicly sought would-be buyers, as was made clear to the House some time ago. General Motors' original interest arose out of talks about mutual problems over trucks. It was always clear from the start that any interest in Land Rover/Range Rover might raise such difficulties.

I think that the whole House would like to pay tribute to Austin Rover's progress, and to congratulate the company on its increasing exports — [AN HON. MEMBER: "Then why flog it?"]—particularly to Europe. I am surprised that the Labour party does not seem to want to hear this part of my answer. In 1985, exports increased by 10 per cent. over the figure for 1984, and in the first three months of 1986, they are 35 per cent. up on the same period in 1985. The new Rover 800 executive car has excellent export prospects, and I hope that it will spearhead Austin Rover's re-entry into the American market.

Mr. Michael Heseltine (Henley): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the bus and truck industries of Britain and Europe now have huge excess capacity? When judging the board's recommendations, what criteria will he have in mind in determining a strategy that will protect British interests?

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Re-rat.

Mr. Channon: I agree that there is a huge excess capacity in the truck and bus business throughout western Europe. We will all have to consider that factor carefully. Indeed, the board of BL will have to consider it carefully in recommending a future course of action to me.

I shall ensure that all relevant factors are put before me before I make recommendations.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent) rose——

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As one who has been had up for unparliamentary language, may I ask whether it is in order for an hon. Member to call another hon. Member a rat?

Mr. Speaker: I heard no such——

Several Hon. Members indicated dissent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If an hon. Member said that, I would ask him to withdraw it, but I— [Interruption.] Order. I repeat what I said yesterday. Let us keep our parliamentary language on a high and traditional level.

Mr. Foot: When did the Minister and the Government make the remarkable discovery that it was the desire and determination of General Motors to take over the whole business?

Mr. Channon: It was always clear that General Motors wanted to take over the whole business. What I have told the House is that we wished to see whether a compromise could be found that was acceptable to all the parties concerned. No compromise was found; therefore, the talks were broken off.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): Would my right hon. Friend not agree that the breakdown of the talks is bad news for General motors and for British Leyland? Would he not accept that the misplaced jingoism of the past four weeks was started by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) with his intemperate private notice question of 3 February? Will my right hon. Friend make sure that the extra redundancies that there will be, and the extra demands for taxpayers' money, are laid firmly on the doorstep of Opposition Members?

Mr. Channon: It would not be right for me to speculate on the effect on General Motors. As to the effects on the British Leyland subsidiaries, I am sure that I will be able to bring to the House proposals made to me by the BL board that will offer them a secure future.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): In the light of his statement, will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the talks broke down over Land Rover and that the Government were willing to see Freight Rover taken over by General Motors, with a consequent loss of 1,700 jobs in Birmingham?

Mr. Channon: The consequence that the hon. Gentleman suggests would not necessarily follow.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Land Rover management buy-out team has received no more than an acknowledgment of the proposals that it made three weeks ago? Is it not time that my right hon. Friend asked Hill Samuel and the Department of Trade and Industry to start talking to Schroder about the buy-out and to make some progress?

Mr. Channon: With respect to my right hon. Friend, he is not quite right about that. I have myself had two long meetings with Mr. Andrews and his colleagues, and I understand that they had a meeting with Hill Samuel that finished only recently; so talks are in progress, and all those matters are being fully studied.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Will the Secretary of State now answer the question asked by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), and acknowledge the damage done to BL by the abortive negotiations? Will he abandon plans to fragment BL, and allow it to make progress of the kind that he himself has just referred to?

Mr. Channon: I do not want to do that, and I will not do so. I do not acknowledge what the hon. Gentleman says. Anyone who says that it is wrong to sell off constituent parts of BL should reflect on the success of Jaguar before he eats his words.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, if negotiations between British Leyland and General Motors had been successful, General Motors would have made this country the centre of its European commercial vehicles operation, and that that would have been of great benefit to this country, bringing new investment and new employment? Given the concern of those who work in Bedford Commercial Vehicles, can my right hon. Friend impress upon General Motors the importance of GM continuing to manufacture commercial vehicles in Bedfordshire to sustain employment there?

Mr. Channon: On the latter part of that question, I am certain that it must be very much in the interests of all concerned that that should be the case. I share my hon. Friend's view of the matter. The first part of his question is a matter for General Motors, but I have certainly heard the suggestion made.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Is it right that the main board of British Leyland should continue to have only two executive directors? Will the Secretary of State assure the House that there will be no victimisation of any executive manager of BL who has opposed all or any part of this package which has been approved by the main board members, not all of whom are successful business men?

Mr. Channon: The House knows that a new chairman of the BL board is to take over in the next few weeks. He will no doubt wish to consider the composition of the board. I shall ask him to look at the hon. Gentleman's point, which is a very good one. I shall also ensure—although I am sure that there is no question of it, anyway—that there is no victimisation.

Mr. Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): In the light of the Opposition crowing in their isolationist joy about turning away much-needed investment in our truck and commercial vehicle industry, will my right hon. Friend tell the House, as a result of the developments that he has announced today, what discussions he has had with General Motors about keeping the design and development of commercial vehicles in this country and what future he envisages for the commercial vehicle industry now that Ford have joined up with Iveco and General Motors will be forced to consider alternatives?

Mr. Channon: Of course I agree with my hon. Friend about the wholly hypocritical attitude of the Labour party. First it was against the deal; now it complains because it is over. That is absolutely typical of its attitude. I have not had discussions with General Motors about the second part of my hon. Friend's question. That is a matter for General Motors, but it is a very important question. I very much hope that General Motors will continue to play such a role in this country.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Has the Laird Group withdrawn its offer and proposals for the future of Leyland Bus, which would have meant the closure of the Workington plant? And what is the status of the discussions with Aveling Barford, which is visiting the Workington plant today?

Mr. Channon: No, I do not think that it has withdrawn its proposals. Aveling Barford has also made other proposals. The BL board will consider those and any other proposals that are put to it, including management proposals, if any are made, and will make recommendations to me in the course, I hope, of the next few weeks.

Mr. Graham Bright (Luton, South): Is my right hon. Friend not aware that this decision has cast an enormous question mark over the future of Bedford trucks and that the opportunity for General Motors to make this country the centre of its research, development and design for the whole of Europe has been blown? If GM does negotiate with Renault trucks or Volvo—we know that it is talking to them—those skills will be lost to Europe. That is exactly what we should be trying to stop. The GM deal would have enabled this country to have a proper truck manufacturing operation. The people of Luton and Bedfordshire will feel that this chance has been blown.

Mr. Channon: I very much hope that my hon. Friend's views will not be justified. I have no reason to assume that they will be justified. I am sure that GM will look carefully at all the alternative ways forward for the Bedford business, which I agree is extremely important for Britain and, I should have thought, for General Motors.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Is the Secretary of State aware that his statement that a condition of the privatisation of Land Rover should be that it is retained in United Kingdom ownership is very welcome? However, is he also aware that the uncertainty is very damaging not only to this business but also to the volume car business? Will he seek to bring the discussions, particularly the management buy-out proposals of Mr. Andrews, to an early conclusion so that the uncertainty can be cleared up?

Mr. Channon: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his support in the first part of his question. I agree with him that it would be helpful if these matters could be brought to a conclusion in the reasonably near future.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Is my right hon. Friend aware that seven heavy truck manufacturers are still based in Britain, none of which exports substantially to Europe, but that, on the other hand, the whole of western Europe has only seven heavy truck manufacturers, all of which export substantially to Britain? Have we not lost a great opportunity to restructure the British truck industry? Will not GM now run off and make a deal with one of our European competitors? Is it not the Labour party that is wholly to blame, for trying to pull the Union Jack over the eyes of the voters?

Mr. Channon: I have never disguised from the House the fact that, if a satisfactory deal with General Motors had been worked out, it would have had many advantages. It is not possible to achieve that deal. We shall have to work on other solutions, and I hope we shall find a satisfactory one.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East) Is not the lesson of this unhappy whole episode that the Government must never again try deceptively and surreptitiously, behind the backs of the British public and behind the back of Parliament to dispose of such a vital part—[AN HON. MEMBER: "What role are you playing?"]—I am trying to protect British interests—to dispose of a vital part of British industry. Is it not true that this rotten manoeuvre was aborted only by the brilliant interventions of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith)?

Mr. Channon: I refute entirely the allegation that the Government behaved deceptively. If the Opposition are seriously suggesting that all negotiations should be carried out in public, they will have a heavy price to pay.

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): Since the most successful part of the motor industry in Britain is owned by the Americans and will probably shortly be owned by Nissan, what is wrong with Land Rover being owned by the Americans if they produce a better product?

Mr. Channon: I judged that it was right, and that it would receive the support of the House, if we could get a deal with General Motors on which there could be a compromise about the ownership of Land Rover. I was not prepared to recommend to my colleagues a situation in which General Motors had effective control of that company and the assurance of full ownership and control within a relatively short time.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is the Secretary of State aware that the workers in Coventry, the midlands and elsewhere, instead of hearing the Secretary of State continuing to tout around the world saying, "Anybody want to buy a car industry?", would have preferred a categorical assurance that Leyland would remain in public ownership? That would end the speculation and worry about workers' jobs.

The Secretary of State has said on a number of occasions that the large-scale volume production of vehicles is essential if we are to compete in international markets. Why does the Secretary of State not reverse the process of recent months and take into public ownership Vauxhall, Ford and Peugeot to create a British motor industry capable of the volume production necessary to compete in international markets?

Mr. Channon: Perhaps we shall see that unfold with all the details as we approach the general election. With regard to jobs, security and prosperity, one should consider what has happened at Jaguar since it was privatised. There has been an increase in its sales and employees. The idea that one has to keep industries in public ownership for them to be successful is a foolish and idiotic idea, believed only by Opposition Members.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Will my right hon. Friend take comfort from the fact that there is widespread support for his policy of returning viable parts of British Leyland to the private sector? Will my right hon. Friend bear it in mind that British Leyland, although technically one company, is a group of companies? Although the truck division would undoubtedly prosper in General Motors, Land Rover and Range Rover are a specialist company, rather like Jaguar. They may well do better standing on their own, financed by the private sector.

Mr. Channon: I take note of what my hon. Friend says; it is a view that many people share.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Secretary of State clarify what he meant in his opening remarks:

"The BL board will give further study to the alternative ways forward for all the businesses concerned"?

I stress "all".

Does not this resurrect the question of Bathgate? I ask the Secretary of State whether he or the Minister of State—who, frankly, has been very helpful in these matters when I and my colleagues have approached him in relation to the complex problems of Bathgate — will give particular attention to the shop stewards' and Scottish Office initiative in relation to Bathgate and Mr. Anthony Bamford. Can some machine capacity be retained at what is the biggest machine shop under one roof in Europe? I see the Secretary of State consulting the Minister of State. The suggestion makes sense. Can I have an assurance that the Department of Trade and Industry will take it seriously?

Mr. Channon: Naturally I shall consider seriously anything that the hon. Gentleman proposes. I am anxious not to reawaken hopes that will have to be dashed again. The chances of doing what he suggests are extremely remote, but I shall certainly have his suggestion examined.

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): As my right hon. Friend is under fire today for defending British interests, can I urge him not to be disheartened, and to appreciate that there is widespread support for the privatisation of parts, if not all of BL? Will he assure the House that the component sourcing policies of BL and parts thereof will be continued, and that the British industry will also be safeguarded in future?

Mr. Channon: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. He raises an important point, with which I agree.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Would the Secretary of State like to place on record his praise for the staff and work force of Leylad Trucks, whose products have risen to the top of the best-selling league, despite the damaging uncertainty which this farrago has created? Can he spell out precisely the time scale that he now has in mind for the so-called privatisation of Leyland Trucks, given the fact that his original time scale has been aborted?

Mr. Channon: I certainly agree with the hon. Gentleman about the immense progress that has been made in Leyland Trucks. He may recall that, in my original statement, I mentioned the trend in its performance, and I met a deputation from the unions in Leyland Trucks recently. I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I would prefer not to give him a firm answer about a timetable at this stage because that would be misleading. I must await recommendations from the BL board about the best way forward for Leyland Trucks, and I hope that I shall have proposals in the not too distant future.

Mr. David Gilroy Bevan (Birmingham, Yardley): Will my right hon. Friend, in accepting my thanks for this further statement, which is a step towards the protection of the jobs of the workers, many of whom live in my constituency, now please instruct the bankers of BL, through the board, to give full and proper information to the managers and all those other companies which are bidding for BL, and not the paucity of information which has been the apology so far given and which has shown their partiality and preference?

Mr. Channon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support, but I cannot accept what he said in the last part of his question. As I said in my original statement, the board will now include in its examination the various expressions of interest which have already been announced so that it can recommend to me the best course forward. I am told that all normal information has been given, but I shall immediately check that with BL.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Why is the Secretary of State such a dogmatic devotee of privatisation? Does he not recall that the former incompetent private owners of BL got it into such a mess that it had to be rescued with public funds? Will he now give the House an undertaking that the Government will keep their incompetent hands off BL and allow it to continue to succeed so that, as taxpayers, we can get back the moneys which we put in to rescue it?

Mr. Channon: I am afraid that I disagree with the hon. Gentleman. All experience shows—I cited Jaguar earlier—that, if we can get the subsidiaries of the companies into private hands, it will give the companies a better opportunity for a secure long-term future. That is true not only for the motor industry, but for every other industry.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is a great community of interest in the future of Leyland Trucks, Freight Rover and many other products in the continuation of reopening of negotiations with GM? Will he make it clear that it is not the British Government who are seeking to close the door on further negotiations?

Mr. Channon: As I have already said, the Government are always ready to consider fresh proposals, but at present there are no plans for the resumption of talks.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the Secretary of State aware of the outrage felt in the west midlands at what the Government have done over BL and the way in which they have acted? Is it not a supreme irony that, when the chairman of the Conservative party was Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, he started negotiations with GM, yet he has told his Cabinet colleagues that selling to GM is simply not on?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman is vastly exaggerating what he calls the outrage in the west midlands, and, as usual, he is distorting the actions of my right hon. Friend, who has been extremely helpful at all stages, as indeed all my colleagues have been. This is a Government decision, and the hon. Gentleman is talking rubbish.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will call the Conservative Members who have been standing, and the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery), who has suddenly got to his feet, for a further five minutes. However, I must bear in mind that further business today is on a timetable.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend place in the Library a copy of the final terms upon which GM was prepared to purchase Freight Rover, Leyland Trucks and Land Rover?

Mr. Channon: I shall certainly consider what my hon. Friend says, but the talks did not end in that way. I put various proposals orally to GM, but it was not prepared to accept them. So I do not think that that is a relevant issue at present.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Now that the wedding is off, can my right hon. Friend assure me that taxpayers will not be asked to foot the bill?

Mr. Channon: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I am satisfied with his statement this afternoon—so much so, indeed, that when I heard during the weekend that the GM deal was off, I ordered a Range Rover yesterday? Is it not time that the House set an example and that many more right hon. and hon. Members brought British cars? I speak as a Rover user, and if hon. Members set an example, I am sure that the country would follow, and British Leyland in private hands would be a highly successful company.

Mr. Channon: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for his support, which I have been accustomed to receive over the years on many occasions. If all the people who talked about BL bought a BL car, BL would have a higher proportion of the British share of the market than it does at present.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will my right hon. Friend accept that many of us have a great deal of sympathy for him in that he was landed with this problem so early in what will be a distinguished tenure of office? Will he further accept that many of us respect him for the difficult decision that he had to make, and believe that he has made the right one? Land Rover, which is a specialist manufacturer, should remain—not in a narrow, patriotic sense, but in a proper sense—in British hands. Will he go one step further and make the other proper decision, which is to back the zeal, ability, willingness and money of the management-worker buy-out, and make an early decision so that this great company can go forward for its workers, for the country and for us all?

Mr. Channon: I am grateful, indeed, to my hon. Friend for his support which, again, I have been accustomed to receiving on many occasions. The management buy-out will be considered together with the other expressions of interest by the board in order to come forward with recommendations for the best course in the future. It would be wrong for me to prejudge that at this stage, but I know that there is considerable support in the House for that. There may well be other options available.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): Does my right hon. Friend appreciate that his statement will come as a great disappointment to those who were hoping for some rationalisation of the British truck industry? Does he agree that those who have wrapped themselves in phoney patriotism in an attempt to oppose that rationalisation will bear a great deal of responsibility if GM now finds itself a European partner, and we end up with no truck industry? Does he appreciate that, if he resumes negotiations with GM for the sale of a controlling interest in both Leyland Trucks and Land Rover, he will have considerable support behind him on these Benches?

Mr. Channon: I note what my hon. Friend says, but I cannot add to what I said earlier. There are no plans at present for the resumption of talks, and it would be misleading if I were to pretend otherwise. However, I note my hon. Friend's comments and I shall come forward with further proposals as soon as I can.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, although the management buy-out is well accepted by many people, it also finds a great deal of favour among the work force? Is my right hon. Friend aware that the trade unions have said that they are willing to become involved financially in such a management buy-out? Such aspirations have been raised to a high level in the west midlands. We hope that they will be realised.

Mr. Channon: I acknowledge what my hon. Friend has said, but it would be quite wrong of me to express a view at this stage on the various alternatives.

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): Does the Secretary of State agree that a much better bargain could be obtained for Leyland Trucks in a year or two if the division were kept in public hands until then?

Mr. Channon: I shall, of course, consider that possibility.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Flannery.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for balancing the questions——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has only just started to rise.

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman has been standing up continually.

Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that a Japanese firm has a great rival to Land Rover—a four-wheel drive car which looks very much like the Land Rover? Is it not true that that Japanese firm is owned by General Motors of America? Does it not follow that, because costs in Japan are much lower, if General Motors gets hold of the Land Rover BL production machine here, it could, from America, in the interests of profit, easily close down Land Rover to make profits in Japan?

Mr. Channon: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, if there had been a deal with General Motors on Land Rover, we would have required satisfactory assurances from that company which would have ensured the future of the Solihull plant, the local content and the other things which I have described to the House many times.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): Will my right hon. Friend accept that many Conservative Members and many people in the automotive industry consider world market share profitability and British jobs to be more important than all the jingoism of the past few weeks? Will he convey to General Motors and to Ford that they are as welcome to prosper and expand in this country as British firms are welcome to do in the United States?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to draw attention to the importance of General Motors and of Ford in the British economy. They are both large employers which put a great deal of money and effort into the United Kingdom. I can assure my hon. Friend that the Government think that they are very welcome.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): Is my right hon. Friend aware that a majority of Conservative Members regret the collapse of the General Motors talks, as a great opportunity lost? Would it not have been better for the Government to concentrate on securing a successful motor industry in Britain rather than to respond to the misguided and jingoistic calls from those who will leave a price to be paid in lost jobs and higher taxes?

Mr. Channon: I note what my hon. Friend says. I hope that I shall be able to come forward, in the not-too-distant future, with proposals on the future of Land Rover and Freight Rover which my hon. Friend will welcome.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall bear in mind when we next discuss this matter those hon. Members who have not been called today.

BILLS PRESENTED

National Health Service (Amendment)

Mr. Secretary Fowler, supported by Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. Secretary King, Mr. Michael Jopling, Mr. Kenneth Clarke, Mr. John MacGregor, Mr. Secretary Rifkind, Mr. Barney Hayhoe and Mr. Ray Whitney, presented a Bill to apply certain enactments, orders and regulations relating to food to certain health service bodies and premises; to make further provision as to pharmaceutical services under the National Health Service Act 1977 and the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978 and the remuneration of persons providing those services, general medical services, general dental services or general ophthalmic services under those Acts; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 119].

Representation of the People (Amendment)

Mr. Robert Rhodes James presented a Bill to amend the House of Commons (Redistribution of Seats) Acts 1949 and 1958, and the Representation of the People Act 1983, to provide for a reduction in the number of parliamentary constituencies to 500, with a minimum constituency population of 100,000, and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 May and to be printed. [Bill 120].

Immigration Act 1971 (Amendment)

4.17 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish a right of appeal in the United Kingdom to those persons refused entry to the United Kingdom, including those persons visiting the United Kingdom.

Today, as on every other day, some 50 people, mostly visitors to Britain from the New Commonwealth and Pakistan, will be refused entry to the United Kingdom. Last year, more than 18,000 people were refused entry to this country and more than 10,000 were black and Asian people from the New Commonwealth and Pakistan. Each person refused entry is given a form saying that they have been refused entry because an immigration officer does not believe that they are a genuine visitor. The form says that the person has a right of appeal but that appeal can be exercised only when the visitor has returned home.

The refusal ruins the person's holiday as they lose their fares and other expenses incurred. It is not surprising, therefore, that more than three quarters of the people compelled to return home do not bother to appeal. If their appeal was successful, most would not have the money or opportunity to return to this country.

My Bill seeks to provide an effective right of appeal which can be exercised by the person while he or she is in this country. That was first recommended in 1967 by Sir Roy Wilson, QC, who chaired the committee on immigration appeals. On the Second Reading of the Immigration Appeals Bill in 1969, the then Home Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) said:

"It is implicit in the Wilson Committee's Report that an appellant who has reached the United Kingdom and is refused entry on arrival should normally be allowed to remain here to await the determination of his appeal".—[Official Report, 21 January 1969; Vol. 776, c. 494.]

Regrettably, the provisions conferring that general right of appeal were never brought into force and were not included in the Immigration Act 1971, which repealed the 1969 Act but retained the basic appeals system.

Under section 13(3), the only rights of appeal that can be exercised here are by persons holding a current entry clearance or a current work permit. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) said in Standing Committee on the Immigration Bill in 1971:

"Every lawyer knows how difficult it is to prosecute any action, however simple, from a distance of 30 miles; and that to instruct legal advisers, interview witnesses, discuss documents not in one's possession, can be extremely difficult, even if one is operating between London and the provinces. Operating between London and Karachi would be virtually impossible. To insist that someone who has the right of appeal under the Bill should exercise it from such a distance, and in those circumstances, is to bring the whole procedure of appeal into contempt."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 20 May 1971; c. 1072.]

Nearly ten people refused entry as visitors turn for help every day to Members of this House or of another place. Hon. Members usually request a stop on the person's removal and that they be given temporary admission. Of the 8,500 people granted temporary admission last year, only 187 absconded.

Introducing a right of appeal which can be operated here, easily and simply, would be a victory for natural justice, as it would allow a person appealing to be present when his appeal is considered. An effective right of appeal would, it is to be hoped, improve the quality of decisions taken by immigration officers. That would reduce the number of people refused entry. That in turn would reduce the number of people who are now forced to turn to hon. Members for help and the number of letters which hon. Members have to write on behalf of their constituents to the Minister of State, Home Office. That reform would most definitely be welcomed by many of our constituents who are angry at the way in which their relatives and friends are now refused entry to this country for holidays and at the conditions and circumstances in which those people have to wait, often for considerable lengths of time. The Bill would make a major contribution to improving Britain's tourist image.

For all those compelling reasons, I commend this modest and moderate Bill to the House and to the Government.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Max Madden, Mr. Stan Thorne, Mr. Harry Cohen, Mr. Derek Fatchett, Mrs. Margaret Beckett, Mr. Peter Pike, Mr. Alfred Dubs, Ms. Clare Short, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. Sydney Bidwell, Mr. Dave Nellist and Mr. David Winnick.

Immigration Act 1971 (Amendment)

Mr. Max Madden accordingly presented a Bill to establish a right of appeal in the United Kingdom to those persons refused entry to the United Kingdom, including those persons visiting the United Kingdom: and the same was read the First time; And ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 25 April and to be printed. [Bill 121.]

Orders of the Day

Gas Bill

[2nd Allotted Day]

Order for Third Reading read.

4.20 pm

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I should like to express my gratitude to all those who worked over the years in preparing and drafting the Bill and in helping us to steer it through the Committee and Report stages. I should like to express my gratitude also to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State and to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State who carried the great burden of the Bill through those stages. I hope that hon. Members will agree that they performed that task with skill, application and courtesy and in the best traditions of the House. It would be no help to the Opposition if I paid tribute to them, but I must say that they vigorously propounded their arguments against the various facets with which they disagreed. I think that hon. Members will agree that, irrespective of one's views for or against the legislation, in Committee the arguments were vigorously propounded and genuinely considered. The Bill at Third Reading is, one would hope, better than it was at Second Reading.

As I pointed out on Second Reading, irrespective of whether one agreed or disagreed with the policy, the Bill was carefully studied and examined before being presented to the House. It was given careful consideration from the time the Conservative party was returned to Government in 1983. International comparisons were made and alternative methods of privatisation were studied. Conclusions were reached after careful consideration.

The Bill was carefully drafted. It was not rushed past the parliamentary draftsmen. Committee members will have recognised that, according to the standards of a normal controversial Bill, the legislation did not require a great deal of Government amendment. There were 250 Government amendments to the Bill which nationalised the gas industry. That legislation was beaten by the Bill which nationalised the electricity industry, to which there were 353 Government amendments. There were large numbers of Government amendments to other privatisation measures. There were 63 Government amendments to the Gas Bill, most of which were consequential. The lesson to be learned is that greater care taken in drafting is of benefit in Committee and in the House.

When I moved the Second Reading, I argued that we wished to ensure that the legislation was to the benefit of gas consumers. Its aim was to improve competition, to cover safety elements and to improve the position of employees. On Third Reading, I recommend the Bill using those same arguments. A number of improvements and changes have been made since Second Reading.

On Second Reading, the Opposition pointed out on a number of occasions that the Bill as drafted looked after certain aspects of consumer interests but that there was a range of consumer interests at which the Gas Consumers Council would not be able to look. I assured hon.

[Mr. Peter Walker]

Members that legally the council would be able to consider matters at which the National Gas Consumers Council had looked. Understandably, the National Gas Consumers Council and Committee members felt that it would be better to spell that out in the Bill rather than leave it open to dispute and hence arguments about validity. On Report, we spelled out the the range of activities which the consumers council of the denationalised gas industry would be able to consider.

The Government want the new Gas Consumers Council to be effective. It will be the responsibility not of my Department but of the Department of Trade and Industry, which has responsibility for consumer affairs. The Department of Trade and Industry has been having meetings in all the regions concerned to study the ways in which the new council can be effectively set up with approprate staffing and facilities to give good service to the consumer.

Not only the Government but British Gas are anxious to see a continuation of the benefits of a good consumer service. I believe that the improved drafting of certain clauses, the new clause and the provisions giving certain powers will make the council an effective organisation.

I do not greatly criticise the present consumers council which now operates under nationalisation but, over the years, I believe that it has become too involved in committees, in passing pieces of paper between groups, and so on. A change such as this gives us an opportunity to ensure that the Gas Consumers Council will use its powers and facilities to benefit consumers. I believe that, in practice, there will be no complaint about the manner in which the new Gas Consumers Council works, certainly with respect to the representation of industrial and domestic consumers.

One obvious objective of the Bill is to improve on the benefits of competition. For more than a century, certain aspects of competition were limited throughout the world, whether in the private or in the public sector. We have learnt from experience following the passage of the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Bill, which was introduced by my predecessor. We have made a number of changes in this legislation which will enhance the aims of that legislation.

During the Bill's passage, we announced the way in which we would endeavour to deal with the problems of imports and exports. There is a potential for further competition. Governments have to continue to take a basic look at the overall national scene. Under our import-export regime, British Gas will have to consult the Government of the day on any major imports it has in mind.

Likewise, if the monopoly position of British Gas was being used in a way detrimental to the development of the North sea, we have made it clear that an application for an export licence would obtain the appropriate waiver providing that the security of national supplies was not put in jeopardy as a result. Judging by the reception of the oil industry and other gas producers, this has been genuinely welcomed as an improvement on the existing situation while retaining the important oversight to ensure that no monopolies on the oil companies' side or on the British Gas side can operate in that respect against the national interest.

One interesting factor about the Bill has been the manner in which our original proposals to ensure that the British Gas contract market did not come into the regulation into which domestic gas will come has been clearly accepted by British commerce and industry as a whole. I remember that, when I argued on Second Reading that in my judgment it was to the benefit of competition and not to its detriment that this area remained free of detailed regulation, there was some anxiety on both sides of the House about that.

In Committee and on Report it was seen that not only major organisations like the CBI and the chambers of commerce, all of whom were carefully consulted before the Bill was drafted, but commerce and industry in general have remained well aware of the advantages that they enjoy from considerable competition in the industrial energy market. British Gas currently enjoys about 35 per cent. only of that market and is in fierce competition with electricity and oil. I believe that that competition is good, and the manner in which the Bill has been drafted means that, if ever British Gas moved to exploit some monopoly situation, it could be referred to the appropriate machinery and dealt with.

The expectation of British commerce and industry is very much that British Gas will find it in its vested interest to remain in a very competitive position in this respect. It remains true that the only strong representations that we have had in favour of regulating British Gas in this sphere of the market have been from its major competitors. On reflection, I think that we were right to include such a provision.

I think that the system of regulation that we have put in place will be effective and to the benefit of the domestic consumer. The consumer will benefit from reductions in the cost of raw materials, if they occur. The current expectation, looking at world oil markets, is that these will be taking place in years to come. I hasten to add that I do not necessarily share that prediction. One matter about which I have remained ardent in my time as Secretary of State for Energy is that I will never make any prediction of a future oil price. If any future Secretary of State for Energy decides to join in that game, I will consider that he has been badly advised. [HON. MEMBERS: "The Chancellor did."] The Chancellor made it clear that he was not making a prediction last week. He said that for the purpose of his figures he had to put in a price, but he made clear that that was in no way a prediction.

While many firms claim to be able to make such predictions, the only thing that they all have in common is that virtually always their forecasts are wrong. If the price of gas moves down, the formula that we have chosen will ensure that the consumer benefits therefrom.

The consumer will have a direct and immediate participation in the improved efficiency of British Gas over the years as new skills, technology and management techniques are applied. As a result, not only will the domestic consumer benefit in terms of price from the regulatory machinery mechanism but, under Governments of all persuasions, the formula will protect that market from Chancellors who have a desire to obtain revenue from that source, be they in a Labour Government, a Conservative Government or, maybe 100 years hence, even an alliance Government. It is a method of regulation that I think will be very much in the interests of the consumer. Therefore, from the point of view of consumer interest, improving competition and the industrial and domestic market, we argue that the Bill is well thought out and to the benefit of the nation.

We have recognised from the beginning of drafting the Bill the importance of maintaining high standards of safety. We not only examined the existing statutory requirements upon British Gas and ensured that they were all transferred to the new company but reviewed those requirements and made a certain number of amendments thereto. Although some mockery was made of changing the 24-hour rule to a 12-hour rule, this was never a gimmick. The management of British Gas, whoever are the managers, will know that nothing is more detrimental to its interests than suddenly acquiring a bad reputation on safety.

The reason why British Gas as a nationalised industry, for commercial motives as well as many others, has paid great attention to safety is that it has known that if, in competition with electricity, oil and other forms of energy, it ever obtained a reputation for being unsafe, it would lose its market share and its customers on a substantial scale.

In all the discussions with British Gas in drafting the Bill, we were at no time arguing with people who wanted either limitations or freedom on safety, we were arguing with people who had a long tradition of passion for safety, people who recognised that a reputation for safety in the private sector was in their commercial interests. Given the responsibilities of the Health and Safety Executive, the improvements that we have made and the quite important statutory improvement that in future British Gas will have a responsibility extending both sides of the meter, we have used the measure not to reduce safety but to improve it.

With regard to employees, I believe that the measure is in their interests in that at long last they can have a direct participation in their own industry. It is also in their interests that the industry will be free of the type of political and bureaucratic interferences from which nationalised industries of every description suffer from time to time. I sense that the employees of British Gas recognise that the measure will be to their advantage. I was pleased that the attempt of certain unions to get a ballot in favour of industrial action against privatisation did not succeed. This was because the employees of British Gas decided that it would not succeed. The ballot therefore went against those who were urging such a course. Irrespective of that, what is important is that the management of British Gas fully recognises that its future commercial success depends upon the actions and quality of the company's employees, and on the atmosphere and good team spirit that must continue in the industry.

I was amused to read recently the suggestion — I forget whether it was by a trade union leader or by a Labour party politician — that, if British Gas was privatised at some lower price and the assets revalued on a replacement cost basis, the result would be a loss to each British consumer of X hundred pounds. Neither consumers nor employees have received any great benefit from that valuation of the assets of British Gas. Now, for the first time, managers and employees of British Gas will have direct participation in the industry. To have direct participation in an industry to which one has devoted one's life is important. Neither employees nor consumers have ever felt a sense of participation.

I took my first faltering interest in politics in the 1945-50 period of the enthusiastic Labour Government nationalising everything and I think they genuinely felt that nationalisation would bring about consumer and employee participation. I am sure that in their quiet, silent moments, most members of the Labour party feel that their genuine aspirations did not materialise. Consumers soon realised that, as is evident from the experience of a certain enthusiastic Socialist professor who travelled to Plymouth without a ticket after the nationalisation of the railways. When he was fined by magistrates at Plymouth for doing so, he genuinely pleaded that he only went without a ticket because he assumed that he did not need one as the railways had been nationalised.

Whatever the merits and advantages or disadvantages of nationalisation, no one could argue that employees or consumers have felt a great sense of participation. The manner in which we intend to privatise the company and to see that employees and consumers are given an opportunity of direct participation will be a major social and economic factor. That is why we intend to pursue that policy with enthusiasm.

I suppose that this measure brings about the most major shift from the public sector to the private sector that has taken place in this country, or perhaps in any country. The gas industry is fundamental and has a great record of service to the people. It will be enhanced by being freed from the detailed examination and interference applied to it by Governments of every complexion. I have been guilty of interference, as have my Labour counterparts, throughout the period of nationalisation. If Government are the sole shareholder, they are responsible for a detailed examination of the industry without actually having the expertise, the knowledge or the know-how to do it well. If they had the expertise, it should be employed in the industry and not in an office in Whitehall.

I am delighted that the House has seen the Bill through its Second Reading and through a Committee stage in which debates were cogent and well argued, but in which we had the strength of the argument in those areas in which we defended our position. I rejoice that the Bill went through Report. Now it is before the House for Third Reading. I plead with the House to give a Third Reading to a Bill which will not only be of benefit to the employees and consumers of British Gas, domestic and industrial, but will create a major industrial manufacturing and distributive concern with a role to play at home and abroad, which it will be able to do with greater enthusiasm with its new freedom than it has been able to do since nationalisation took place.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): We welcome the Secretary of State back to the fray after 157 hours of silence. I do not know whether 25 March has anything to do with it, but I understand it is the Secretary of State's birthday. I only hope that the House does not give him a birthday present of the Third Reading of the Bill at the end of the debate.

British Gas is one of the most successful of British industries. It is a public monopoly, highly efficient, profitable, and expanding. The Government intend to turn it into a private monopoly without major competition and without the regulation safeguards which we have been advocating throughout the passage of the Bill. There is only one reason for the Government's actions—to sell off the industry on a once-for-all basis purely to raise capital to meet their election strategy.

On Second Reading, I said that there was nothing in the Bill that would improve efficiency or produce cheaper gas. That remains the case. In fact, after 157 hours in Standing Committee we are even more concerned about the future of the British gas industry, the service to consumers and the rights of employees than we were at the outset. In Committee we sought to enshrine in the legislation rights for consumers and for employees which would at least maintain the present position, and in many cases improve it. We argued continuously that we were not living in a perfect world with British Gas and that improvements could be made under public ownership and a public monopoly. Therefore, we advocated many changes which would be beneficial to the industry, to the people who work in it and to the consumers who depend upon it.

The Government have not accepted any real changes to the Bill. They continue to assure us that the current relationship with consumers and employees will stand, but they refuse to ensure that that will be the case by writing it into the legislation. Several issues discussed in Committee still give cause for concern and are not adequately dealt with by the Bill or the authorisation. I make no apology for returning to those arguments today.

The rights of consumers are still badly met by the Bill, particularly those consumers who already have problems in paying for their fuel. As we stated in Committee, and on Report, we are extremely concerned about the abolition of regional gas consumer councils. Consumers' access to redress needs to be strengthened, not weakened, in the face of a private monopoly. Despite the Government's oft-stated belief that the rights of consumers will not be weakened, we cannot accept that. Without the necessary statutory obligation to ensure lay representation at regional level, the consumer protection offered will be anything but cut price. Conditions during this winter have increased the awareness of both the public and the politicians about fuel policy.

In Committee, the Opposition attempted repeatedly to write into the legislation protection for the poorest consumers—those in most need of fuel and those with the least ability to pay the ever-increasing costs of the fuel. The present code of practice on payment of bills provides some safeguards for those in difficulty. Condition 12 of the authorisation merely states that gas suppliers shall publish codes. We have tried to establish a statutory code with strict but reasonable guidelines for a public gas supplier and safeguards for gas consumers. We are specially worried that a private gas corporation will have rights of entry and of disconnection that at present exist for a publicly owned company. We are moving from a publicly owned company which is answerable to the House under the present legislation to British Gas plc which will not be answerable to the House.

The Under-Secretary told us in Committee that British Gas will continue the present code of practice. For the long-term good of the consumer, this must be strengthened by statute.

A further worry is the price of gas and the standing charges. The authorisation says that the gas corporation must use its best endeavours. We had a legal interpretation of that from the Under-Secretary, who is a solicitor. He made great play of the words "best endeavours". We said then that to use "best endeavours" to keep increases and standing charges below the rate of inflation was not sufficient. We have given the Government two opportunities to clarify this by making it clear in the Bill that standing charges shall not rise by more than the rate of inflation. Both opportunities have been rejected.

According to the Under-Secretary, "best endeavours" amounts to a clear obligation to ensure that standing charges do not increase above the annual retail prices index. If the intention is clear, why do the Government refuse to make it clearer and to allay the fears of consumers, especially the elderly? We know from our correspondence that consumers are not reassured by the Government's statements. Evidence from Age Concern to the Select Committee on Energy made that plain. Age Concern said:

> "Fuel costs and particularly the standing charge form a high proportion of the expenditure of elderly households, and unexpectedly high bills, service and repair charges are all a drain on the weekly income."

We know that consumers are worried about gas prices. They know that gas charges have risen too fast because the Government have used them to raise extra income, and one of the ways they have done that is through the gas levy. We have gone through the whole of the Bill—Second Reading, Committee and Report, and we have heard the Secretary of State move the Third Reading—and nothing has been said about the continuation of the gas levy. Since its inception, the gas levy has cost consumers £2 billion. Last year alone it was £504 million. That amounts to a surcharge of 4p per therm on gas.

Despite the assertion that the privatisation of British Gas will free the corporation from Government interference, the Government are to maintain the gas levy. This regressive tax is paid by the poorest consumers. The Bill is an opportunity for the Government to make a real difference to the many people whose fuel bills are a source of anxiety, and they can make that difference by removing the tax levy and reducing the price of gas. Again, the Government have rejected that opportunity. It is astonishing that, while the Government are prepared to assert that consumers will be no worse off, they are not prepared to ensure that that will be the case.

The Government have asserted that the network of gas showrooms and the services offered by British Gas to elderly and disabled consumers — such as free safety checks and the provision of special appliances — will continue. They probably will for the time being, but in Committee we sought an assurance that they would continue in the long term.

Mr. Michael Portillo (Enfield, Southgate): Is the right hon. Gentleman committing a future Labour Government to the abolition of the gas levy? Could he make that clear?

Mr. Orme: This Government introduced the gas levy. Without hesitation, we support the abolition of the gas levy. The only way to ensure the continuation of showrooms and services is to write into legislation obligations on the public gas supplier. Unfortunately, as on standing charges, we have been given only bland assurances, with nothing to back them up. The hon. Gentleman asked about the gas levy. It is odd that his right hon. Friend said nothing about it from beginning to end of this Bill, and he is not prepared to do so now. On every issue that we raised to strengthen consumers' rights—access to advice, information, redress and safety—the response from the Government has been the same. The Opposition remain unconvinced and so does the British public. It is still the case and nothing that has been said has contradicted it that the only people who will benefit from this massive sale will be the financial marketeers. Throughout the debates we have raised the issue of the market and what will happen.

It is unfortunate for this Government that the City has been under the spotlight in recent months. The public is increasingly aware that all is not well in the financial markets. While unemployment rises and poverty soars, people in the City are making vast profits from the sale of public assets. The Government's privatisation record is coming under heavy scrutiny and criticism.

The sale of British Telecom, the largest sale to date, must be our comparison for the proposed sale of British Gas. The Government have ignored the conclusions of the authoritative Public Accounts Committee report on the sale of BT. They have ignored criticism about their reliance on the advice of merchant bankers, and they have not said that the share price will not once again be undervalued. Despite the reservations of the Public Accounts Committee, the Government are going ahead with the appointment of overseas promoters for the sale of shares. In Japan, the United States and Switzerland, merchant banks are preparing to repeat the financial killing made in the BT flotation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not pursue that analogy too far. I think he knows that it is out of order on Third Reading of the Gas Bill.

Mr. Orme: This is part 2 of the Bill on the flotation of shares, and in Committee the Government used a comparison with British Telecom. I urge you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to accept that this is a valid comparison.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On Third Reading of a Bill we are required to confine ourselves to what is in that Bill. References to another piece of legislation are not in order.

Mr. Orme: Obviously, I accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I feel that we are putting forward a valid argument. No doubt we shall hear of the vast fees paid in commission to City firms. We shall hear about that after the event, and once again it will be the taxpayer who loses. We saw what happened in previous privatisations. For instance, £200 million was taken out by the City when BT was sold only a few months ago.

The Government have side-stepped the effect of the fall in oil prices on the flotation of British Gas. The Secretary of State referred to oil prices this afternoon, but we want to know what effect those falling oil prices might have on the sale. As we know, the Financial Times reports today that the oil price has now fallen to $12 a barrel. Many pundits believe that it will fall still further. With such a massive sale of public assets at stake, we have the right to know whether the Government have a strategy for dealing with that.

The public are becoming increasingly alarmed at the extent to which the Government are pursuing their privatisation programme. It has no theme or logic. The excuses for it keep changing. The latest is that it is an attempt to encourage people's capitalism. But only 6 per cent. of the population now own shares, and the responses to the Budget show that there will be no significant increase in that number.

The Secretary of State referred to safety, which he knows is a sensitive area. Throughout, we have raised no scare stories but have dealt with safety in a genuine manner because, in changing from a public to a private monopoly, we have a right to ensure that safety is up front in the industry. Throughout, we have sought crucial guarantees and assurances on safety in the industry. It is not sufficient to alter the call-up time. We must ensure that properly trained staff are available and that the Health and Safety Executive will be properly equipped. We are particularly concerned that the Health and Safety Executive will not be adequately staffed and will be unable to devote crucial time and attention to the supervision of safety in the industry.

We want a specific statement from the Minister about the future staff levels for gas safety in the Health and Safety Executive. As a result of information that we have received, we are worried that the Health and Safety Executive will not necessarily have adequate staff, and it is essential that it should. We want an assurance from the Government that there will be the facilities and the finance to provide such staff.

The Labour party believes that the British Gas Corporation belongs to the nation. As I said on Second Reading, under a Labour Government it will be returned to the public sector. That will be achieved in a way that is consistent with our other economic aims and priorities. We have made it clear that this privatisation has nothing to do with efficiency, profitability or competition. It is a major part of the Government's strategy for the next general election. Without the sale of British Gas, they would not be able to carry it out. It is an outrage that the corporation, which serves 16 million households, is to be used in that way.

We are fundamentally opposed to the Bill, and the British people will come to understand the magnitude of the Government's action. I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the Bill.

5.3 pm

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): As a former member of the Select Committee on Energy, I want to take this opportunity to welcome the privatisation of British Gas and to wish it well in the private sector. We have just heard all manner of accusations about the Government's motives in seeking this privatisation. But with the example of so many successful privatisations behind us, with so many industries prospering far more effectively in the private sector than ever they did under the control of the Civil Service, it is no longer theory but proven fact that industry does better in the private sector.

We are accused that this is part of our election strategy. Indeed it is part of our election strategy. This latest example of people's capitalism is an important step forward in developing a broadly based property-owning democracy in Britain upon which our future stability and prosperity as a nation depends.

The flotation of British Gas is a particularly important step because it will add sigificantly to the number of private shareholders, which, at 6 per cent. is far too small a proportion of our population compared not just to the United States but to other European countries, and it will add to the size, variety and vigour of the stock market.

The privatisation will be a splendid opportunity for the employees of British Gas to participate in a direct way in the success of their company. Their decision to vote down industrial action on the privatisation issue was in no small measure influenced by the fact this is a far more real and visible way for employees of enterprises to identify with those enterprises than the vague notions of national ownership which have long since been proved to be flawed and ineffective in practice.

[Mr. Spencer Batiste]

I hope, although there is not much evidence of it today, that in time the Labour party will come to accept the policy of privatisation, just as it is now being forced, by the weight of public opinion, to accept our related policy on home ownership.

The debate has been distinguished particularly by the positive and constructive role played by the Select Committee on Energy in its proceedings. The Select Committee has the resources to explore the detailed ramifications of complex Bills in a way that hon. Members on their own cannot. When there is substantial cross-party support on the Energy Select Committee, it behoves the Government to take the points at issue seriously.

One such point at issue is whether there should be in the Bill an obligation to promote energy conservation measures. On balance——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman heard my earlier rebuke. I hope that he will take it into account and confine himself to what is in the Bill.

Mr. Batiste: I am in no way seeking to propose any amendment or to add to the Bill, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I merely wish to make the point that it was well expressed in Committee that the Bill should carry a clear message to the energy supply industry that energy conservation is important to the House and that if the warnings made during the Bill's passage through the House are not heeded, further legislation to promote the cause of energy efficiency will undoubtedly become necessary.

The major issues that we must now address are, first, those relating to the consumers' interest. The protection of the consumer is one of the most practically important issues that the Government have to face. In my area the North-Eastern gas consumers council has made many constructive suggestions. Inevitably there remain some matters that it and other councils will wish to see pressed in another place, but I congratulate the Government on listening to so many of the representations that have been made to them, and, most particularly, on broadening the remit and referral powers of the new Gas Consumers Council. That has been widely welcomed by all those who care about the gas industry's future, as compared to the Opposition, who seek only to make noise and to create spurious objection.

My next point is critically important. When a large organisation with such extensive market power as British Gas is moved into the private sector, there is the need to promote competition. Gas is competitive with other energy sources, but it is also important to encourage alternative gas suppliers if market forces are to operate effectively. I am delighted that the Government have accepted the amendment tabled in Committee to give the director general responsibility for promoting competition. There are those who would perhaps wish that we had gone further, but, in the final analysis, as we have seen with the privatisation of British Telecom, the vital factor is the calibre and the determination of the people chosen to operate the key watchdog roles.

This is a Third Reading debate as you have already reminded us on several occasions, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so I shall be brief. Any Bill of this size and complexity, whose central purpose is so inimical to Labour's concept of state ownership, is undoubtedly capable of indefinite debate and much contrived indignation when finally the guillotine inevitably falls. The major issues have, I believe, been adequately aired and the Bill is in a reasonably acceptable form, though that need not preclude further adjustment in another place. This measure is a further important plank in our progress towards a property-owning democracy, and I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): We have engaged in many hours of debate on the Bill, but we have not really arrived at a point very substantially different from that from which we set out. The Government have tried to justify the Bill as promoting greater efficiency and wider share ownership. Yet even the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste), in spite of his eulogy of some abstract theory, acknowledged that there was not enough in the Bill on that issue. The Government have resisted amendments to promote energy efficiency on the spurious ground that it would be unfair to other energy suppliers. That was the basic argument used. I suggest now, as I did in Committee, that the easy way to resolve the matter is to charge all energy producers with responsibility to promote energy efficiency. I am sure that this is something that all parties would support.

Wider share ownership will be achieved, if it is achieved—there are some who feel that the widening of share ownership will be nothing like as great at the end as it looks at the beginning—at the expense of siphoning out of the financial institutions billions of pounds that could have been much better directed to stimulating new enterprise, wealth and jobs. It is really foolhardy of the Government to say that money cannot be taken out of the City for an enterprise such as this without taking it away from other enterprises which might need it more desperately.

Last week I challenged the Under-Secretary of State to say whether there were any market circumstances in which the Government would decide that it was sensible to postpone the flotation of British Gas. After all, they have done it with British Airways, presumably for commercial reasons. At that time, the Minister simply showed his discomforture in the normal way—by hurling a load of abuse at the alliance—but did not answer the question. I think that we are entitled to know whether the Government are determined to float British Gas this autumn, regardless of the market circumstances.

The Secretary of State acknowledged that in his Budget speech the Chancellor told us that he had assumed an oil price of $15. The Secretary of State said that this was not a forecast, but simply an assumption, and I accept that. But today, less than a full week since the Chancellor sat down, the oil price is under $12 and heading for less than $10. Leaving aside the fact that the fall in the oil price since this time last year and, indeed since six months ago, has wiped £5 billion off our net oil exports, will the Minister acknowledge that this has serious implications for the share price of British Gas, which had already been reduced by over £2 billion, according to analysts, even when the price of oil was $15?

I suggest that even if the Government were determined, in principle, to go ahead with privatisation, it would be irresponsible to do so in circumstances where the market is at the bottom of its price and the asset, which at the moment belongs to the nation, is likely to be substantially undervalued. We are entitled to know whether the Government have any views on that.

I shall press this point a little further by asking the Minister to say, when he replies, what valuation for British Gas is assumed in the Chancellor's forecast in the Budget statement that the receipts expected from privatisation in 1986-87 are £4·7 billion. What assumptions have been made about the percentage and value of British Gas included in that figure, and what implications does that have for the next Budget when coupled with the falling oil revenues?

Anyone who is buying shares will clearly have to consider these factors. If I were intending to buy shares in British Gas, which I am not, I would want to know what the future was. I would also want to know what scope there was under the Bill for British Gas, when privatised, to protect itself, as it will instinctively try to do. By protecting itself, I mean using its monopoly position to cushion itself against falling prices. The Government have not supported adequate measures to promote competition and, whatever their protests to the contrary, British Gas will continue to be to all intents and purposes the monopoly supplier of gas in this country. It will be able to abuse that monopoly to protect its position.

I shall give one or two examples. Will the price formula be flexible enough to allow the corporation to keep up prices, for example, to those domestic and commercial users who are committed to gas and have no alternative, while at the same time reducing prices to those industrial users who have made an investment by giving themselves flexibility and are therefore not so vulnerable to the British Gas monopoly? I suggest that private shareholders are likely to press a private gas corporation to take such action if it thinks it can get away with it. Will it be prepared to give incentives to new customers to come on to gas supply, to subsidise their capital investment and to charge that subsidy to existing users of gas? It is not clear from the legislation that the corporation would not be able to do that. Will the director general have the power that he needs to prevent such an appalling abuse?

Those questions have not, I believe, been answered, and I am certainly not satisfied that this is adequate consumer protection.

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): I am concerned about consumer protection. In fact, I implored my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) who worked with me for years, to put a question for me in Committee about consumer protection. I should like to ask what protection there will be for the consumer, not on the tariff to be charged, but on the way in which tariff will be collected. Estimation is going on under the present gas boards. What protection will there be for the consumer in connection with estimated bills if the new gas authority refuses to read the meter and simply makes an estimate?

Mr. Bruce: In Committee we pressed for a code of practice, but were not successful in securing it. The Minister will no doubt answer the hon. Gentleman's question more fully.

Consumers and shareholders should be in no doubt that a future Government would be prepared to introduce amending legislation to prevent the sort of abuses that I have outlined. We would certainly be prepared to do so and to strengthen the powers of the director general to acquire the information needed to control such abuses. We would ensure that any information he acquired was published, that hearings were held in public, and that consumers or their representatives had the right to cross-examine. That is the kind of control, accountability and regulation for which we are looking but which the Government have denied us.

In these circumstances, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will not be surprised to hear that I and my colleagues are not satisfied with this legislation, even if we were not opposed to the principle in the first place, which we are. The import-export regime which the Government announced very late in Committee is something which shareholders need to take on board. I am not sure that they are really any the wiser about what the Government will do. I do not quarrel with what the Government have said. My only quarrel is over the fact that what was at the end of the day such a sensible decision could not be announced on Second Reading, but was left so late in the deliberations on the Bill.

We would be prepared, since it would be impossible, in my view, to renationalise British Gas even if the Labour party wished to do so, to introduce measures which would expose British Gas to more effective competition. In spite of statements from Labour Members, the Government have not taken the necessary measures to do this, and have not supported initiatives from their Benches either. We would be prepared to consider legislation to break British Gas up into regional companies, and we regret that this has not been properly debated, although the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson), and I put the argument on a number of occasions. The Labour party is intent on keeping British Gas as a central institution, because it hopes to be able to renationalise it and has refused to support us, and the Government have denounced the idea without intelligently arguing against its merits.

We shall make sure that the privilege of owning shares —it is a privilege—in a major utility, which will still be the monopoly supplier of gas, is not a licence to print money. It is reasonable for people to get a fair return. A fair return is one thing, but exploitation is another. None of these questions have been answered by the Government, and none of the assurances that we want have been given. In the light of that, my right hon. Friends and hon. Friends and I will join the Labour party in the Lobby against the Bill.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand that we have at the most 80 minutes left before the Front Bench speakers reply to the debate, and at least 10 right hon. and hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye. The arithmetic will be very obvious.

5.20 pm

Mr. Michael Portillo (Enfield, Southgate): The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) said that if funds were taken from the City for investment in British Gas, they would not be available for investment elsewhere in British industry. The hon. Gentleman showed that he had entirely missed the point of what is going on with the privatisation programme, which is that in the big issues like British Gas, and British Telecom before it, the Government have appealed to a source of finance that has never before been tapped — the ordinary man in the street investing in shares for the first time. The argument of the hon. Member for Gordon therefore falls flat on its face.

On Second Reading I welcomed the Bill in principle because I thought that privatisation would be good for

[Mr. Michael Portillo]

British Gas, good for its customers and employers and for the nation. However, I expressed some reservations about the Bill. Today, I have fewer reservations than I did, but I confess that some of them linger. At heart, my reservations are to do with whether the Bill establishes sufficient competition, and my thesis is that it is better to rely on competition to ensure the good of the customer than to rely on any kind of regulation, because competition would always do the job better for the customer.

I have three main concerns. The first is the competition that British Gas will face in obtaining gas supplies from the sources at which they are produced, in particular from the North sea. I wish to see British Gas having to bid against the competitors to win gas in the first place. Towards the end of the Committee, the Government made a statement about imports and exports of gas that clarified the position and gave us the basis that we needed to judge the Bill as a whole.

The Government statement was not exactly the statement for which I had been hoping, because I had hoped for an entirely free regime of imports and exports. Nevertheless, the statement was widely welcomed and was held to be a marked improvement on the previous position. In particular, it allows the Government to judge applications for the export of gas on a case-by-case basis. I wait to see how this will work out in practice.

I have two suggestions for the Government. First, will they make it clear that any company is as free as is British Gas to import gas, so that any other company can apply for imports? My second suggestion is that the Government should soon authorise an export of gas to demonstrate to British Gas that this is more than a theoretical possibility and that it can be carried out in practice, as that would have a dramatic effect on the way in which British Gas conducts its business.

My second concern was that the regulator should have a specific duty to promote competition in the supply of gas. Here, I am delighted to say that the Government graciously accepted my amendment, and I am pleased about that. It could prove crucial. I agree heartily with my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) that the important thing is the choice of person who will be the regulator. If the right person is chosen, as I am sure he will be, he will bear this duty in mind when applying it to a whole range of decisions — for example, in judging disputes that occur over the common carriage of gas by British Gas for third parties and on the supply of back-up gas from British Gas to private suppliers.

My third concern is about the prohibition of anti-competitive practices by British Gas. In Committee, I suggested specific prohibitions of anti-competitive practice—that was my first line of defence. My second line of defence was to oblige British Gas more clearly to spell out from where it derived its profits and where its costs would be spread among the various regional activities so that we can judge more accurately whether cross-subsidy was occurring. I failed to convince the Government or the Committee on this point, and my right hon. Friend the Minister in particular sought to rely on the Competition Act and the Fair Trading Act. He believed that there are sufficient powers available for all these concerns to be taken care of. I still have some doubts, but I hope that, in the fulness of time, I shall be proved wrong, and the Government right.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State often says that nationalisation requires Ministers and civil servants to run businesses, and they are unqualified to do so. That is the best shorthand reason for privatisation. Even where, after privatisation, the extent of competition is limited, pressure from shareholders, bankers and customers can be exerted much more effectively. One cannot mimic those forces while the company remains in the state sector.

I have a feeling that, in its heart of hearts, the Labour party is not as far from us on this as it would have us believe. I have a feeling that the Morrisonian ideals of nationalisation have, in practice, disappointed all of us. People do not feel that they own the British Gas Corporation, nor do the customers of British Gas feel that they are getting a high level of service because the employees in the industry feel that they are serving their fellow man and that they all own the industry in common. The employees of British Gas have lacked the incentive of competition, and it is that element that the Bill seeks to introduce.

I welcome the Bill now because I believe that it will help the customers of British Gas, its employees and the nation. To a large extent, some of these virtues have been recognised by the Labour party, although the Opposition spokesman, who spoke so charmingly in the Standing Committee, the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme), went through the motions of opposing privatisation root and branch. In practice, Labour Members went through those lines rather as though they were speaking lines in a play, and not giving them tremendous conviction. It is a tremendous tribute to my right hon. Friend and the Government that they have argued and won the case for privatisation, and even convinced a number of Labour Members.

Mr. Michael Cocks (Bristol, South): I apologise to the Secretary of State for not being here for his opening speech. The decision not to come into the Chamber was not inadvertent. I felt that, had I been here, my parliamentary courtesy would have been overridden, and I would have pointed out to him that his Third Reading speech was longer than his contributions in Committee.

I was surprised at the speech made by the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste), because he branded himself as a parliamentary scavenger picking up fag ends. He was not even on the Committee, but he had to be here to speak before those of his colleagues who had served on the Committee had spoken, to make his Central Office points, which were hardly worth the occasion.

In Committee, I christened the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) the hon. Member for Enfield, Cold Feet. I did not intend to propagate that title, but, once again, he has shown himself to be running for cover, trying to play both ends against the middle and managing to ensure for himself some future reincarnation as an Opposition Front Bench spokesman.

The Bill puts me in mind of the old-style Western films where the main street, which is the subject of the film, was made up of elaborate sets—banks, hotels, and so on. There may have been an elaborate front, but behind it there were just a few props holding the whole edifice up, and there was no substance to the buildings. The Bill has been produced without the thorough-going research which was in hand and had borne fruit when the industry was nationalised.

The main point of reference in Committee was the Heyworth report, which is an analysis of the state of the gas industry at the end of the war with details of the number of undertakings throughout the country, their distribution, and the great pockets where there was no gas supply whatsoever. That was only one of several major studies which led to the nationalisation of the industry. However, the industry is being dismantled and put out to privatisation without any corresponding research.

Time and again in Committee we asked what estimates had been made by the Government and the Civil Service over various aspects of the Bill. Each time, when the verbiage was stripped away from the reply, the answer was nothing. Therefore, the Bill is based on inadequate research and thought and is really a doctrinaire measure to try to widen the base of the Government's appeal. It is the fulfilment of an election promise made without propper research. Indeed, when I pressed him, the Under-Secretary of State for Energy, although a former candidate for Bristol, South, did not realise that the Conservative party headquarters had been moved from Merrywood road to North street in Bedminster, the premises which were converted into Regal Amusements.

When we look at the provisions of the Bill, we are concerned about the inadequate guarantees about safety. It is important that during the debate we put it on record that we are by no means satisfied that the bland assurances that have been given about the privatised company will hold water in reality.

On Report I referred to the flexibility and quick response we now enjoy when we contact chairmen of the respective gas boards, and I gave a particular example. I am happy to tell the House that my confidence was reinforced when the matter that I had raised was dealt with within 24 hours. That is the sort of service that the Government are placing in jeopardy.

Therefore, while at this stage we cannot make any changes to the Bill before it goes to another place, I think it is important for us to place on record our fears and reservations about what might happen. God forbid that there should be a major disaster when the industry is privatised. If there is, I hope it will be recognised that the Opposition placed their reservations on record and that, if anybody is found wanting in the scrutiny and preparation of the Bill, it is the Government.

In view of your comments earlier, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall conclude my remarks. I hope that in another place the reservations we now have about the provisions in the Bill concerning safety will receive further scrutiny, and that possibly, even at that late stage, the Government will make a concession which could give us at least some reassurance that note has been taken of all the representations.

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): I should like to make a short contribution taking account of the statistics you gave us, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about time and the number of people wanting to speak.

I wish to welcome the Bill on Third Reading, having been through a long and contentious Committee. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) in endorsing the principle of privatisation and I believe that this Bill is an important step along that road. I should like to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on introducing the Bill and his colleagues for steering it through Committee. If it is proper, I should like to say a few words of congratulation to the Opposition on the way in which they showed us in Committee the knowledge they have of the Bill. They fought it hard, but in so doing, they showed that the Bill had been well thought out. The majority of points they were criticising were incorporated into the Bill in any case.

The two major points I should like to make are about competition and regulation. My hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) has already said that, if the competition were stronger, perhaps we would not have to have so much regulation. The Bill has been prepared in such a way that, wherever possible, notice has been taken of the need to encourage competition. The Bill is written to allow for competition from other gas companies should other companies ever be formed which could provide gas at domestic house level rather than just providing large tranches of gas through the common carrier. We know that the gas industry has been subject to competition for many years from other fuels, but that competition is always subject to price, the technology available in the industry using the other fuels and the availability of other fuels.

Gas is not the easiest commodity to bring into industry or domestic houses. Despite that, over the years the gas industry has been able to obtain 85 per cent. of the heating market in this country. That shows that the gas industry has been competitive in the past, and there is no reason to doubt that it will continue to be competitive in the future.

The Bill provides for other gas suppliers to use the common carrier system to supply gas to customers throughout the country. I expressed some reservations in Committee about how often the common carrier would be used, bearing in mind the fact that British Gas may be inclined to over-price the use of that facility. Even now, if there is surplus capacity on the common carrier, I believe that the charge for using it should be on a short-run, marginal cost basis.

We know that the gas industry was investigated by Deloitte, Haskins and Sells in June, 1983, and the achievements of the gas industry, which are recognised in this Bill, were stated in that report. It congratulated British Gas on the conversion from town gas to natural gas and the way in which British Gas has increased its market share over the years.

I should like to come to a point made by the right hon. Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks). Deloitte, Haskins and Sells also mentioned the fine safety record of British Gas and its proud industrial relations record. In my experience, the safety record in private industry is second to none. I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman has any need to fear that, because British Gas will be privatised, the safety record will in any way be less than it achieved as a nationalised industry.

The record of the industry is a credit to the executives who have run it in the past, the work force and the people throughout the whole of British Gas who have been involved — from connecting pipes and digging holes through to setting prices, marketing and running the whole organisation. It is also a credit to the sponsoring Department, the Department of Energy. I am sure that all those things will continue when British Gas is privatised.

The Director General of Gas Supply will be primarily responsible for regulation. From time to time, he will have to use the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, but in practice regulation will be his responsibility. He will, of course, work in conjunction with the Secretary of State for Energy. Indeed, I thank the Government for accepting in Committee an amendment that I and my hon. Friends put forward, whereby the relationship between the Director General of Gas Supply and the Secretary of State would be brought out into the open, so that we could know of the instructions and communications that passed between them when regulating that large privatised gas concern.

In the Bill, the Director General of Gas Supply is required to encourage competition, to be unbiased towards British Gas—it must ensure that it is fair in its dealings with all gas suppliers — and be customer-oriented. Moreover, under clause 33, the director general must ensure that gas is continuously available to gas users. There is a danger that there will be a gap in the supply of gas in the early 1990s, but I am sure that the director general will take that into account.

The main regulator used by the Director General of Gas Supply will be price. The price is being fixed by a formula which is now well known. It seems complicated, but careful study reveals it to be not too bad at all — [Interruption]. The formula is

It is not too difficult at all. But price control alone will not encourage profit levels to be kept at the low level required if the consumer is to get a fair deal. Therefore, I feel that the director general, working within the Bill's terms of reference, will want to consider publishing the profits made by British Gas. The information could be used for control of the organisation. It could also be used to judge how the formula should be reviewed in 1992, and could show that there was not excess cross-subsidisation between the various parts of a privatised British Gas.

When price alone is used as the regulator, we must ensure that it does not hide windfall profits that might arise through the price of other energy sources rising faster than the price of gas, causing gas to be used more than those other energy sources. That can only be checked by having some knowledge of the profits made. I am confident that, in the short term, the director general will control and regulate effectively. In the longer term, regulation will be reviewed by the Secretary of State. However, I am sure that we shall have a thriving and most acceptable privatised gas industry, and I and my constituents look forward to the issue of British Gas shares later this year. Indeed, many of my constituents have told me that they want to buy those shares. This whole venture represents one more step in the promotion of popular capitalism which has so caught the imagination of this country.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): We have just heard two very convoluted speeches from Conservatives Members. On the one hand they ask for market forces and competition to be allowed their head, and on the other they want the regulator to have more powers to regulate the industry, once privatised. I am not sure what they really want, or what they are pursuing in their dream of privatisation.

But it is certain that the Secretary of State did not come clean today about the real reasons for privatisation. We have not heard from Conservative Members, including the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) who is just about to leave the Chamber, what those reasons are. Indeed, during the hon. Gentleman's flight of fantasy, he paid tribute to the fact that the Government had paid attention to the Select Committee's views. I am sorry to disappoint him, but the Government ignored the Select Committee's views to the extent that they introduced the Bill and put it into Committee when they know that the Select Committee's report would be published. The Government completely ignored that report. I am sorry to deflate the hon. Gentleman's ego over his membership of that Select Committee, but the Government clearly do not think much of the Select Committee's recommendations. They even ignore the Public Accounts Committee, of which I am a member, when it tells them, time and again, that they are ripping off the public by privatising our state industries.

The Secretary of State did not give the real reasons for privatisation because he will not stand up publicly and admit that it is a rip-off. The fact that privatisation is a rip-off can be demonstrated quite easily by considering the seven main industries that have been privatised. It is clear that they could have been sold for almost £2 billion more than was achieved in their flotations. However, we shall return to that point later.

I am amazed by the hypocrisy of Conservative Members. They pay tribute to British Gas as it now exists, to the workers and its organisation, and then say that they want to sell it. Why do they want to sell such a large industry, which is very profitable? It provides about £500 million a year through the gas levy and makes profits of about £1·5 billion. Why do Conservative Members want to sell it? It needs to be sold solely to line the pockets of their City friends. For example, their stockbroker friends will gain about £300 million.

The hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) is yawning. Perhaps he does not want to be party to this charade. Oddly enough, he opposed the Government at certain points in Committee. He did not have the courage to vote against the Government. At some stage, the Minister would say that he would look at the matter, and the hon. Gentleman would back off. Indeed, the hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) and other hon. Members were told by Government Whips to back off in Committee, although they knew that certain parts of the Bill were nonsense.

The hon. Member for Elmet said that private industry was better than public industry. I wish that that was so, and that the history of nationalisation in Britain showed that Labour Governments had taken profitable industries into public ownership. But the history of nationalisation in this country shows that the Labour party has had to take into public ownership corrupt and badly run private industries in order to protect jobs and our economic structure. That is why we had to nationalise the coal, car and aerospace industries. We did so not because of any blind dogma or ideology — unlike the Conservative Government — but because those industries were bankrupt, and we wanted to protect the many jobs involved.

The Government do not care about the jobs of those involved. They will talk about them, but when it comes to the crunch, they do not care. Their justification for provisions affecting consumers and safety is always that market forces and competition will right any wrongs. I believe that the Government are wrong. Throughout the Committee stage the Government argued that all would be the same after vesting day. The argument is that British Gas plc will be a marvellous private company because the public corporation is a good and profitable company.

That does not follow. British Gas exists to provide this country with cheap, clean fuel and to contribute to the general economy of the country in the public interest. The motive of British Gas plc—the reason for its existence as a private company—will be to make a profit. The possibility of the public interest being a major feature in any decision made by the company will go by the board. In no private company in this country, when decisions are being made in the board room, does anyone ask, "Do we make a profit, or do we act in the public interest?" With relatively small companies that is OK, although I do not think that we can afford them. Many decisions are made in private companies on the basis of the pursuit of profit rather than the public interest. We can swallow that.

However, we are now talking about a major industry. The present-day value of the industry is about £17,000 million. Last year there was a profit of well over £1 billion, and there was also the gas levy of £504 million. The rate of return on assets was 25 per cent. Ninety three thousand people work for the company and over a quarter of a million are employed in providing services and equipment. British Gas is not a little back-street operation in which private interest can be permitted to be the dominant feature and the money boys to make their cash; it is a major enterprise. If this major industry is badly handled in the private sector, the effect will be enormous.

I am quite sure that British Gas plc will not deliberately break safety standards. However, neither did Union Carbide in Bhopal, and neither did the private coal companies, when under private enterprise they killed 53,000 people.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): Disgraceful. We are talking about British Gas.

Mr. Rogers: It is all very well for the Minister to scoff at what I say, but that is what happened in the pursuit of profits. Many decisions were made in coal mines that caused the death of miners. I can provide chapter and verse. One need only to go to the Library to see how many of my constituents—and indeed some members of my family—suffered as a result of the mindless pursuit of profit in the coal mines.

It will not happen deliberately, but if there is a sin of omission rather than a sin of commission, it will be a great sin. The Government had the opportunity to put some statutory safety requirements in the Bill. They could have tightened up on safety. It is no good the Government saying that the matter has been covered in the same way as it was in the case of British Telecom. As I said in Committee, telephones do not blow up but gas installations can. Unless the highest standards are maintained there may be tragedies, as there have been in the past. No one will have designed those tragedies—accidents are accidents—but it is incumbent on us as legislators to ensure that the possibilities of accidents are restricted.

Constraints of time prevent us from taking up some major issues that were not fully developed in Committee. Great problems will arise. There is the issue of competition. What will happen to an organisation with a built-in infrastructure? There are pricing policies, market development, tarrification and resource development. What is to stop British Gas plc investing in villas in Spain or north Africa rather than ensuring adequate future resources and development in the North sea, or in the development of liquefaction and gasification processes so that we can import from other parts of the world when North sea gas runs out? Those are all aspects of a big unknown. With the privatisation of the gas industry, we are taking an awful step into the unknown.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): The Bill has been improved since Second Reading, although not as much as I would have liked. My hon. Friends the Members for Elmet (Mr. Batiste), for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) and for Rochford (Dr. Clark) have eloquently outlined some of the matters that still concern us. However, I believe that the Bill has improved enough to be given a Third Reading tonight and a fair wind. I hope that when the Bill reaches another place the Government will be obliged to reconsider some of those important matters, especially those to which the Select Committee drew attention. The Bill may then be improved still further.

Part II covers the sale of shares to the public. I am very concerned that the Government's privatisation programme should not be discredited. I believe that it is fundamental to our future, to the economic strategy and to the improvement of our performance that the privatisation programme should succeed and that it should not be damaged by criticisms such as were made by the Public Accounts Committee of some of the previous public sales.

We might as well be honest and admit that in the Government's eagerness to sell other nationalised industries, miscalculations and misjudgments were made. We want to avoid any criticisms in connection with this sale. We must ensure that there is no repetition of what took place when, during the speculation, some in the City made far too easy profits.

I hope that when part II is applied and the shares are sold, the Government will provide a genuine opportunity for the small investors, and especially the employees of British Gas, to have not just the first but the juiciest bite. I believe that many of my colleagues would, like me, be most disappointed if there were to be a undignified stampede of speculative stags, as with some previous privatisations. That would seriously damage the whole concept of wider share ownership and the privatisation programme.

Every sale—especially a large one—must provide a tempting discount on what experts regard as the market price. It is therefore especially important that if there is to be a discount on the market price that discount should go primarily to the employees of the company and to the small shareholders—in other words, the customers—rather than to underwriters and to overseas institutions, as has happened in the past. It is most important that the offer for sale should be organised on such a basis that the majority of the shares go to employees and to small shareholders rather than the larger investors.

I have one suggestion which I hope my right hon. Friend will consider. I hope that this proposal will enable the Government to overcome the embarrassments of previous sales, which had to be priced on an arbitrary basis—always difficult if not impossible—with the result that there was a large premium and the taxpayer was deprived of a fair proportion of the revenue. A different form of pricing was required.

Is it really necessary that all the shares should be sold on the same day? Why cannot the offer for sale be on a open-ended basis, in the same way as the Government sell gilt edged on tap and in the same way as the Govenment sold their BP shares in tranches? Why cannot the first tranche be worth only £1 billion—10 per cent. or 20 per cent. of British Gas shares — in order to establish a market price?

The first tranche could be allocated primarily to small applicants, in the same way as British Telecom shares were allocated to small applicants and employees. If a premium developed, as it is bound to develop, the bulk of the benefit would still be in the hands of the Government. The rest of the stock could then be sold on a tap basis, on rising prices. As demand developed, the Government's nominated brokers for the sale could subsequently sell, on rising prices, to the large investors and to the institutions the bulk of the issue, once a market price had been established from which the small investors would benefit.

What is the rationale of obliging all the stock to be sold in one indigestible gulp? If it were sold in tranches, would it not make the huge cost of the underwriting unnecessary and would it not provide a fairer total value for the taxpayer without depriving the small shareholder of a fair investment?

Furthermore, would it not reduce the risk of having to price the issue at the wrong price? Only a small proportion of the issue would be offered for sale at the initial launch. If the price of the 10 per cent. or 20 per cent. that was offered for sale was too low, at least the Government would not be subjected to the sort of criticisms to which they would be subjected if the price were too low and everything was sold on that day.

As the initial tranche that was offered for sale would be allocated primarily to small applicants and to employees, because they would be given priority, it would ensure the Government's objective of promoting wider share ownership. The first tranche at the lowest price would go to those who ought to have the shares—employees and small shareholders. Subsequent sales on a tap basis would mean that whatever stock was then available would be sold at the genuine market price, which would probably be a higher price, to the larger investor.

I urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy to consider this type of package if he wants to avoid further criticism of a privatisation issue on a large scale depriving the taxpayer of the full benefit of the sale and not ensuring that the small investor gets a fair deal.

6.2 pm

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): My right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) raised a very important issue at the beginning of the debate. He referred to the fact that several issues have not been dealt with adequately during the proceedings on the Bill. The Opposition are still concerned about health and safety. We are not sure that the Health and Safety Executive will be able to police this private monopoly with the care that is needed.

The factory inspectorate is 35 per cent. below the recommended staffing levels that were accepted by this Government in 1979. If the safety aspects of the Bill are to be enforced, the Government must provide the resources to back them up. My right hon. Friend today asked for those assurances, and we shall not be satisfied if they are not given this evening. We have not been persuaded by Ministers that the Health and Safety Executive will be able, with its present staffing levels, to carry out the increased responsibilities that are being laid upon it by the Government. In fact, the opposite is the case.

Since 1979 the Health and Safety Executive has been given more work to do but has been provided with fewer resources with which to do it. Its field force has been cut by over 25 per cent. However, since 1979 it has been given additional responsibilities. It has to enforce new regulations which are more time-consuming to enforce than the old regulations. In 1974, the inspectors were expected to carry out the inspection of 240,000 premises. By 1984, they were expected to carry out the inspection of 800,000 premises, although their numbers had decreased. They are able to visit some premises only once a year. They are able to visit other premises only once every 10 years. How will the Government ensure, therefore, that the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 is extended in order further to protect the public unless the strength of the Health and Safety Executive is greatly increased?

Those who work for the Health and Safety Executive are at the end of their tether. They cannot cope now with basic inspections and they have to abandon potential risks that would have been a very high priority only a few years ago. In 1981, when gas safety was the responsibility of the Department of Energy, there were 30 prosecutions. Since the Health and Safety Executive has taken over that responsibility, there have been only two prosecutions. That is not an indictment of the inspectors. They cannot accept further responsibilities without an increase in their numbers.

The Chief Inspector of Factories has issued guidance to the inspectors. He tells them not to keep a low profile but he expects his instructions to be maintained. They are to minimise the heavy burdens that could be placed on the resources of the Health and Safety Executive. The 530 factory inspectors operating in the field will have all these new responsibilities placed upon them. The Government want to give them even more responsibilities. Is that a responsible approach to a difficult problem? Any objective observer would say that it is not.

The answer is not to abolish the laws on health and safety, as Lord Young of Graffham has promised. We have yet to receive an assurance that that proposal is not to be taken seriously. At the very least, the staff of the Health and Safety Executive should be increased by about 50 per cent. That was promised by a Conservative Government. In the light of the anxiety about safety that we have expressed throughout the proceedings on the Bill, we hope that the Government will initiate moves that will ensure such an increase.

The Secretary of State for Energy told us this afternoon that the employees are being promised direct participation in their industry. However, according to a TUC report that was published this week, privatisation has led to fewer jobs and worse terms and conditions of employment. How can the Government claim, therefore, that the employees will be better off? The TUC says that there has been significant job shedding in companies that have been privatised or in companies that are candidates for privatisation. Associated British Ports has cut its work force by about one fifth. British Aerospace has lost 10,000 jobs since privatisation. Cable and Wireless shed one fifth of its United Kingdom staff in the year after privatisation.

British Telecom has embarked on a staff cutback. The report shows that industrial relations and union facilities have become worse.

This provides a warning to employees in the gas industry and in other industries where privatisation is threatened. Free shares and other inducements are no substitute for adequate rights and conditions of work or, indeed, for the loss of jobs.

6.8 pm

Mr. Tom Sackville (Bolton, West): When I spoke during the Second Reading debate on the Bill I acknowledged that this could put me at the mercy of the Chairman of the Committee of Selection. By that time it had begun to leak out that members of the Opposition were, for some reason better known to themselves, affecting ignorance of the many virtues of the Bill and that the Committee stage could last longer than the piece of legislation which I was invited to consider this morning. The Professions Supplementary to Medicine (Winding up of Remedial Gymnasts Board) Order of Council 1986, the proceedings on which lasted from 10.30 am to 10.31 am. The reason I exposed myself to these dangers was the fact that the Bill is one of a limited number of Bills dealt with by this House since I entered in 1983 on which I can express unreserved approval.

I sought to catch your eye, Mr Deputy Speaker, not only for the opportunity to wish the Secretary of State and the Opposition Whip a happy birthday but to express to the House that, during the past few weeks since the Second Reading debate, it has become clear to me that there are no reasons why British Gas should stay in public ownership — whether on the grounds of safety or the interests of the employees or the consumer.

When one considers the history of British industry one cannot pretend that there are any benefits flowing from public ownership, especially within our economy. Rather than benefits we have witnessed a long series of cases of decay, inefficiency, lack of positive management, terrible industrial relations, subsidies and interference from politicians. No one is criticising the current management of British Gas or indeed, criticising the work force, 500 of whom work in my constituency. No one will claim that there will be a sudden, overnight transformation in the fortunes of British Gas.

We believe, however, that British Gas, in private hands, will attract new dynamic management — it will be controlled by people who are qualified to control major commercial enterprises and not by politicians or civil servants who are clearly not qualified to do so—and it will offer wide employee participation with its attendant benefits.

The Bill is not about lining the pockets of the City as has been claimed, nor is it about adding lustre to the Chancellor's Budget. The Bill is meant to ensure that gas continues to be supplied to British industry and to the British people as efficiently as possible and at the most competitive price. We shall, therefore be able to take the fullest advantage of the energy resources available to us.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I am rather flabbergasted by that last contribution to our proceedings. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) did not grace our Committee with speeches of a similar nature. I think that he found some difficulty in putting to the House reasons why the Bill will be acceptable.

The Bill is not paltry, as it represents the privatisation of a huge corporation. The arguments which must be addressed to the Bill go further than the simple issue of privatisation. I take up the challenge which the hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) made to the Minister and the Government when he said that they should look carefully at the way in which British Gas is to be put on to the market. Frankly, it is a scandal that over the past couple of years huge amounts of public cash have been virtually given away by the lack of adequate pricing of shares.

The hon. Member for Erewash made his contribution and quite wisely departed, but I think that he failed to take into account the reason why British Gas is being privatised in one unit and a huge dollop of shares will be put on the market at the same time. The answer is simple, and I do not think the Government will honestly try to deny it. The Government need the £5 billion, or whatever will be achieved, by the sale of the shares for the next Budget and for the general election. That political priority has blinded the Government to some of the other changes which were necessary in the legislation.

One of the serious failings of the legislation is the lack of provision for proper tight and tough regulations and a competition policy. We should have had one or the other, but, during the course of the Bill, we have achieved neither. The regulations are weak, and, as the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) rightly said, must be tightened up. There is no prospect of any competition from other supply companies.

One has only to consider the way in which the oil companies have slammed the door in the Chancellor's face to understand the lack of influence that the Government will have once the ownership of this huge monopoly passes into the private sector. I am concerned about pricing and the supply of gas, because overall production is not sound. We will lose along the way on the purchase of equipment.

My main objection to the legislation is the centralisation that it entails. The Scottish Council Development and Industry has sent all Scottish Members — the remarks are especially addressed to their Lordships in another place — a further document in which it draws attention to the need to tackle the centralisation issue. It states:

"privatisation plans should involve efficient service to consumers and management of resources in Scotland. The Council believes that the optimum development of the business is best achieved with devolved management. Even the existing level of devolved management is not secured by the Bill."

I find it interesting that hon. Members and members of the Select Committee who have addressed us this evening have bypassed or even debased their position as elected Members of this House. They have said that there are serious defects but that they are prepared to give the Bill a Third Reading so that the unelected House—the one which exists by patronage of succession—will be able to do a job which they do not have the political courage to carry out. That is a commentary on the way in which we run our affairs.

The Government have made serious mistakes with the Bill. They have been driven to this measure on a timetable that has been far too fast. They have adopted a structure that will be dangerous and damaging because of the level of centralisation, and they have failed to look after the interests and safety of consumers. They have done this for party political reasons — to win, or in the hope of winning, the next election. Over the past four months we have been debating privatisation. I venture to suggest that once this huge private monopoly is in force, within four or five years we will be debating the need to break it up, in the same way as the American telephone system was broken up.

The Labour party has made a mistake in assuming that it is better to keep the private monopoly in one unit for the purpose of nationalisation. The Labour party is taking a gamble—whether it will be able to afford to take over the monopoly, or indeed whether it will be in government at the next election. I had hoped that the Labour party would recognise the need for adequate decentralisation. Unfortunately, the Government have refused to admit that basic principle. At the end of the day, Conservative Members, who at one time were dedicated to competition, will feel that they have betrayed the interests and long-standing philosophy of their own party.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): The House and the country are fully aware of what the Bill is all about. It is not about efficiency and consumer protection; it is about political dogma. It is concerned with attracting finance for the Government and winning votes at the next election. The Government hope to achieve that by using this vast amount of money to reduce taxes and to kid the electorate that they have fulfilled their election manifesto. It is purely and simply political dogma.

The Government are selling off the nation's assets, as has been said time and again, at a price well below market value. To use a popular cliché, they are selling £10 notes for £5. That is what will happen. It is an absolute scandal that the nation's assets can be sold off in this way.

All hon. Members are aware that the Bill allows 15 per cent. of the total assets to be purchased by people abroad. That may not appear to be a large percentage. Although I would not care to put a specific figure on it, it could amount to £1,000 million. Therefore, British Gas could be owned by people abroad to the extent of £1,000 million. If the Conservative Government are prepared to do that purely and simply to fulfil their political dogma, the British public will undoubtedly have taken note of it.

The Bill has proceeded with indecent haste in Committee and on Report. We all know what happened in the early days, but I am concerned about the Government's complete disregard of the Select Committee's recommendations. The Select Committee considered the Bill at length and in depth and made unanimous recommendations, although it has a built-in Conservative majority. That has proved to me that the Government have no regard for the work of Select Committees.

Conservative members of that Select Committee must face the biggest embarrassment. On 13 March a headline in The Guardian declared that the report stage would be unique because every member bar one of the Select Committee had signed amendments which would embarrass the Government. Indeed, we all looked forward to that unique occasion. It was the first time that a Select Committee had tabled amendments to a major Bill. We looked forward to the courage of those hon. Members who signed the amendments, but what did we find? The evening when the Chairman of the Select Committee moved the amendments, only one Conservative member of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost), had the courage to vote. Apart from the hon. Gentleman and the Chairman, none of the other Select Committee members had even the decency to come to the Chamber and listen. They have done a great disservice to Select Committees.

We have always been aware of the Government's attitude. Indeed, the Secretary of State went on record a few weeks ago saying what he thinks about Back-Bench interference in Select Committees. He is shaking his head now, but that was widely reported. Those Conservative Members who supported the Select Committee's recommendations and signed the amendments have done a great disservice to Select Committee procedures. They have become a myth. If "hypocrisy" were not an unparliamentary word, I would probably use it.

I fully concede that the amendment about competition by the director general is welcome, although it could have gone further. The name of the organisation was changed to the Gas Consumers Council, but other amendments have been only minor. Indeed, the Bill remains almost as it began, and obviously that was the Committee's intention.

Many outstanding aspects are still to be dealt with, and we can only hope that they will be dealt with in another place. There is the problem of standing charges. We have heard constantly about "best endeavours". The Secretary of State and the Minister have given us assurances about that phrase. If "best endeavours" is legally binding, why do they not make it a statutory responsibility under the Bill? That would not be a hardship. People are not confident that that phrase is legally binding. The Secretary of State in his evidence to the Select Committee said that he was worried about that aspect, and that, as far as he understood it, as a layman, it was hard lines if one could not cope. For the life of me, I cannot understand why the Government will not accept that "best endeavours" should be a statutory responsibility. I hope that the Government will also give further consideration to codes of practice.

The Government continue their programme of selling the nation's assets. It means wealth for their supporters, and many of their supporters had better support the Tory party with contributions during the election campaign.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I am pleased to have this final opportunity on Third Reading to speak against the Bill. Some Conservative Members seem to be under the illusion that we in the Labour party are not fully opposed to the privatisation of British Gas. We must make it clear that they are 100 per cent. wrong, that we are 100 per cent. committed to the public ownership of British Gas, and 100 per cent. opposed to the Bill.

However, I agree with one statement made by the Secretary of State in his opening speech. He referred to the present form of public ownership perhaps not having lived up to what some people expected it to achieve in 1945. I accept that in 1986 we may well need to consider certain differences when the Labour Government take organisations back into public ownership. We need to ensure, for example, that the industry is far more involved in and better serves both consumers and employees, as well as the nation, than it may have appeared to do in the past.

We must convince the electorate that we are not in favour of public ownership and opposed to privatisation, such as this, purely because of dogma, but because it is in the nation's best interests as we can use the industry to the nation's best advantage through public ownership.

The Bill is not in the nation's interest. The nation will suffer when the Bill receives its Third Reading, approval in the other place and, ultimately, Royal Assent. The Government are selling the industry to fulfil their political dogma and because they need money to finance either public expenditure before the general election or tax cuts. Whichever they choose, they can use the proceeds from British Gas only once. One can use an asset only once. The Government have repeatedly failed to tell the nation and the House that, and to say what they will do to close the gap of the £1·5 billion profit which British Gas at present makes for the nation. It is perfectly proper, fair and reasonable that a profitable public industry should be allowed to use that profit to subsidise some aspect of public service that can never run at a profit. I have no objection to that type of cross-subsidy. If that is Socialism and public ownership, I am proud to stand for it. I look forward to the day when we have a Government which will take this important industry back into public ownership.

It is true that the Government's policy on gas nationalisation is aimed at short-term financial gain and that that policy is long-term financial folly and nonsense. This Government, who pride themselves on being the economists and financiers of the world, should recognise that their policy is nonsense and not in the interests of the nation.

The Government gave no account to the Standing Committee of the amount that they expected to receive from this biggest ever sale of a publicly owned industry. It is almost certain that we will not get the true value for it. If recent privatisations are anything to go by, the people who will make the money will be the financiers in the City and the friends of the Conservative Government. The people whom the Government represent will not benefit.

The Bill is not in the national energy interests of this country. Energy is so important and fundamental to the nation that it should be controlled by the Government. It should therefore remain under public control and should not be in private hands. A publicly owned energy industry should pursue policies of conservation and develop new fields. These policies will suffer once the Bill receives the Royal Assent. British Gas has a vital role to play in developing substitute natural gas supplies which will be essential in the next century when the natural gas in the North sea and the Irish sea runs out. We will need substitute sources of supply, and they should be provided by an organisation under public control, not in the private sector.

The Government have said several times that they need to remove the shackles from the industry. They believe that the Bill will do that. However, this Government have actually imposed more shackles on publicly owned industries than any other Government. The Government have said that British Gas must sell the Wytch Farm oilfield and that British Gas could not buy Sleipner gas. There are many other examples of how the Government have shackled the industry—for example, through the gas levy.

If the Government believed that management and the control of British Gas had been too restrictive and that there had been too much interference by the Government —if one accepts that that argument is true—they could have removed the restrictions. They could have done that without having a Bill for privatisation and by giving more freedom to British Gas.

In Committee, the Government repeatedly praised the record of British Gas. However, one wonders why they now need to put that industry into private ownership, especially if the industry has served the nation so well. I would certainly support 100 per cent. the idea that the industry has served the nation well.

The Bill is detrimental to the consumer. Although an important amendment was moved by the Government on Report, in the face of considerable pressure by my hon. Friends in Committee, we are still very anxious about the Bill. We believe that profit will become more important than service, that showrooms will be under threat and that corners will be cut. The Secretary of State said in his opening speech that he believed that commercial judgments would force the new owners of British Gas to conform to the levels of safety to which I have referred. Although I accept that that is likely to be true, there is no reason why amendments on safety aspects should not be in the Bill, to ensure that such measures are carried out.

We have ended up with a bad Bill, and I hope that hon. Members will vote against it. I look forward to the day when British Gas is taken back into public ownership.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) over the way in which he disposed of the charge that the Opposition were not 100 per cent. opposed to this deplorable Bill. The Secretary of State tried to launch that idea at the beginning of the debate when he offered the House his contribution, which was a mixture of urbanity and arrogance. He seemed, in his birthday euphoria, to be enjoying not having the discomfiture of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the problems that that right hon. Gentleman faces.

The Secretary of State suggested that the Bill had been thoroughly prepared and carefully worked out. He proved that this was the case by his claim that there were so few amendments. He may find that some of the amendments that my right hon. and hon. Friends and I tabled might have improved the Bill. Had the hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) been a member of the Standing Committee, he might well have supported some of the Opposition amendments. I believe that in some mild way his was the only sane and sensible contribution that we have heard from the Government Benches today.

As I have said, there was only a very minor word of sanity from the Tory Benches in the contribution from the hon. Member for Erewash. Quite frankly, some of the speeches from Tory Members this evening have been deplorable. They have clearly overlooked a number of points that Opposition Members made in Committee. Tory Members seemed to imagine that the Opposition will be somewhere in the queue behind them when privatisation takes place.

We know why Tory Members are here today and interested in the Bill. I am only sorry that the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) received a shock to his system when he discovered on joining the Standing Committee that the Committee was not going to last for only a minute or so.

[Mr. Peter Hardy]

In the short time that I have available, my task is to summarise the main objections to the Bill and the principal points that my hon. Friends have made. Basically, the Opposition regard the Bill, whatever view one may take of the quality of our opposition to it, as a dogmatic assertion of irresponsibility and a profligate approach to a great public asset.

The Secretary of State suggested that, because people were not joining in fervent opposition to the Bill and because people had not become passionately attached to the idea of community involvement, somehow the Morrisonian concept had failed. However, if one looks at the way in which British Gas has become perhaps the greatest single industry or commercial organisation in Britain and one of the most successful in Europe if not in the world, it is evident that with good management and proper industrial relations public ownership can make an enormous contribution to the national good. The Opposition have real reservations as to whether the privatised British Gas will make the same contribution to the British economy or to our record of commercial success — a success that is rapidly eluding the Government.

My hon. Friends have offered detailed criticism of the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) showed how the profit motive, without adequate control, can lead to appalling risk. In the debate we have stressed on several occasions that we are anxious about safety. We have not, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) said, tried to start scare stories about safety. However, we are entitled to express reservations about the safety factor.

I know that from time to time the Secretary of State became somewhat restive when we stressed our concern about safety, but that concern remains. My hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) pursued that matter in Standing Committee and stressed that if the Health and Safety Executive is to fulfil its responsibilities with regard to gas safety, it will have to receive a greater commitment and larger resources. We were not reassured when the Minister of State said that there had been a substantial upsurge and growth in the Health and Safety Executive, as it transpired that that "upsurge" was from 1,266 people to 1,242. That arithmetical presentation did not give us much confidence about the Government's commitment to safety.

We remain concerned about inadequate provision for the consumer. One representative per region is not enough. I hope that our anxieties about this aspect will be firmly expressed in the other place. I imagine that some Members of the other place who are worried about the regions will not give great joy to the Government.

The hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) offered us a reassurance about the formula. We were not reassured when the Government produced that appalling, complicated numerical gobbledegook. My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) had to explain it to the Committee. He is a historian. The hon. Member for Rochford had to wait until Third Reading to tell us that it was all clear and concise. How many gas consumers are seriously impressed by the formula that the hon. Member for Rochford now finds so attractive?

The regulator does not have sufficient powers, esteem or standing. I believe that, during this debate, some Conservative Members began to move towards that view. There is certainly cause for concern that the director general may not have adequate powers either to interfere in prices or to ensure that there are sensible policies to guarantee supply.

We must be suspicious of the Government's attitude to supply. The Secretary of State was the Treasury's willing tool in blocking Sleipner's contract, but he now suggests that British Gas can return to that field for supply. I wonder whether, despite the fall in oil prices, gas consumers will pay heavily for that political interference. The Secretary of State offered British Gas the attractive prospect of freedom from political interference but British Gas probably well remembers that political interference by a Conservative Government has greatly damaged the industry and been of great disadvantage to the consumer.

We do not believe that the British consumer will benefit from this privatisation. I have asked the Minister of State to tell us whether people from overseas have already been employed to assist in the disposal of British Gas under part II. The House should be aware, although the press has appeared to ignore this fact, that Goldman Sachs of New York, Wood Gundy, Nomura of Tokyo and the Swiss Bank Corporation International of Zurich are all involved in assisting the Government to develop this vista of wider and democratic share ownership in Britain. We do not need the Swiss Bank Corporation International to assist in getting shares for the workers.

Presumably workers with shares will not be allowed to be influential. The quorum at the annual meeting will be two shareholders, which gives meaning to the Conservative party's attachment to democratic and wider share ownership! Those two shareholders will presumably be Sir Denis Rooke and some other friend who has a fair number of votes. The quorum will probably not include the workers. Perhaps the hon. Member for Rochford or, perhaps even more likely, the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) will be involved.

Dr. Michael Clark: Why me?

Mr. Hardy: The hon. Gentleman was particularly keen to see a structure which would allow the piracy in terms of economic theory to which he has long been attached. That is why I offered that prospect.

My hon. Friend the Member for Pontefact and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) reminded the House that the Government believed that they had served Britain's interests well by suggesting that no single foreign holding would be allowed to have more than 15 per cent. of the shares. The Government expected us to fall down in gratitude and satisfaction when that national protection was offered. We cannot guess what 15 per cent. will be because we do not know for how much British Gas will be sold. I hope that the other place will insist on the Department of Energy providing information on the character of the privatisation which will follow.

The Secretary of State said that the Committee considered the matter in detail. However, some key aspects of the flotation were not considered. The Government would not tell us how much British Gas was worth. It is all right for the Secretary of State to say that some Labour Members suggested that the asset value should be a guide to the sale price—the Government may not expect to receive £18 billion from the sale, which is the net asset value at present—but the right hon.

Gentleman cannot then protest if, on selling British Gas for £6 billion or £7 billion, we complain that the national interest has been badly served and that a public asset has been disposed of in a profligate manner.

We are not relieved when, having expressed concern about the people who might own British Gas, we are told that Companies Act protection will apply, which means that anyone who owns more than 5 per cent. of the shares will have to be known to British Gas. That means that Conservative Members or, more likely, some of their more disreputable friends will have to declare a holding when it gets to a £300 million or £400 million level. We gain no great comfort from the thought that people like Conservative Members—or like President Marcos of the Philippines, Baby Doc of Haiti or any other of the assorted people who are viewed more favourably by Conservative Members than they are by us—could be secret holders of British Gas shares. What a picture of a measure which is supposed to assist the United Kingdom but which is a contemptible attempt by the Government to ensure that they get enough money to bribe the electorate at the next general election. That fact was not mentioned by the Secretary of State, but it was mentioned several times by my colleagues. It will be mentioned many more times between now and the next general election.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): We have had a good debate in the final stages of the Gas Bill. Although there are obviously deep differences and divisions between the two sides of the House on what is best for the future of British Gas, all the speeches have been marked by an appreciation of the achievements of the gas industry.

Gas is a great, important and well-managed industry, which is a tribute to those who have taken part in it and built it up over many years. Both sides of the House are united in their desire for the gas industry to continue to be a great industry and to serve Britain. Obviously, it is disappointing that we differ about the need for change. That background has resulted in a marked constructiveness and public-spiritedness in our debates. I should like to thank those hon. Members who have contributed to our debates.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I appreciated the contributions made by the Select Committee on Energy.

Mr. Lofthouse: They have not shown it.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I believe that we have shown it. The Select Committee's work, the evidence that it took and the report that it submitted to the House are all signs of that. The Government, including my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I, have made a direct response to the Select Committee's recommendations. For example, we have responded with respect to competition, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) referred. I am afraid that I always think of the way in which the right hon. Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) used to refer to my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate. I am glad that I did not fall into the mixture of words used by the right hon. Gentleman. The competition measures in the Bill have been improved.

With regard to energy efficiency, the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) tried to poke a certain amount of fun. My hon. Friends the Members for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) and for Erewash (Mr. Rost) were right to stress the importance of energy efficiency and conservation, and on Report we had a good debate on it. Clause 4 incorporates an obligation on the Secretary of State and on the director general to ensure efficient and economic gas supplies and use. That responsibility cannot lightly be discarded. It has been in the Bill from the beginning and, although it may not be as specific as my hon. Friends might have liked, we are committed to it, and the director will be committed to it when the Bill is enacted.

If I may deal with the question of transparency in the accounts—the second debate on Report in regard to the Select Committee report—I remind the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford that my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) withdrew his amendment because I was able to give the reassurance that this was a matter to which the Government had paid attention. Although it was not in the Bill in the way that my hon. Friend might ideally have desired, the point was covered in the authorisation that comes under the Bill.

Mr. Lofthouse: Does the Minister agree that his hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd), before he withdrew his amendment, made it clear that he thought that some parts of the Select Committee report were falling on deaf ears?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: They certainly did not fall on deaf ears. I have given a number of examples of where direct action has been taken. I pay tribute to the work of the Select Committee.

Many speakers today have concentrated on the two important areas of competition and regulation. I make no apology for the fact that one of the major purposes of the Bill, in areas where British Gas obviously has a monopoly, has been to write in strong, clear and firm regulations. We have seen no need—indeed, we think it is undesirable—to extend the area of regulation beyond that which is absolutely necessary.

With regard to the contract market—something that the Opposition have never come to accept—increasingly, as the debate has gone on outside the House, those who have asked for more regulation have clearly demonstrated, if demonstration were ever needed, that there is competition in the industrial market, and that we were right to limit regulation to those areas where it was needed. In that regard, we have made sure that it will be strong.

By writing into the Bill an obligation on the director general to promote competition, we have given him a role in that respect as in other areas relating to pipelines and the common carrier. The director general will also have control over the tariff and its greater transparency.

Perhaps most notable—this we introduced on Report—are the new provisions relating to the obligation on British Gas to provide back-up supplies. This, I believe, makes the common carrier provisions more important and gives them more force than ever before. In a number of important areas where competition needs enforcement, we have made certain that these form a major part of the Bill, together with the authorisation under which the director general will have certain responsibilities.

As to regulation, the director general has real powers of enforcement in respect of some of the matters that I have mentioned. If the public gas supplier does not comply with its obligations, the director general has power to enforce it to do so. He also has the power to modify the authorisation to ensure that the powers and authorisation provided in the Bill are effective.

I believe that the Government have been responsive at all stages of the Bill to the importance that the House attaches to the need to protect and promote the interests of the consumer. We made a major amendment to the Bill on Report to ensure that it is explicit about what the Gas Consumers Council is able to do. We have made sure that in all areas—in the matter of contracts, appliances and goods imported from abroad—the council will be able to act, and any consumer who feels aggrieved in any way will be able to take his complaints to the council.

Contrary to what the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) said, there will be regional representation on the Gas Consumers Council. We are giving the council the freedom to set up the kind of structure and organisation that, in the light of its experience under other legislation, it judges best able to represent the needs of consumers throughout the country. I certainly trust the new Gas Consumers Council to carry on the work of the old Gas Users Council. I believe it is right to give the new council a degree of freedom to run its own affairs and to operate in the interests of consumers. I am confident that it will be as effective as the old council.

On the question of safety, once again we have witnessed a certain amount of scare-mongering to the effect that, in privatising British Gas, we are in some way weakening safety provisions. That is not true. We have taken the opportunity in the Bill and in other related measures to strengthen the safety provisions so that the new gas industry under private ownership will have greater obligations than hitherto.

We are continuing the 24-hour emergency service, and British Gas will continue to carry out free safety checks for the elderly and disabled. There will be a stronger Health and Safety Executive regulation which in future will be backed by the power of custodial sentences rather than just fines. We are increasing the number of Health and Safety Executive inspectors, contrary to the impression that the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) has constantly tried to give to the House. More inspectors are being recruited. The Health and Safety Executive is devoting 60 per cent. more of its time to gas safety measures than hitherto. It is sheer scaremongering to say what the hon. Member for Cynon Valley and other Opposition Members have been saying. There will be new codes of practice for gas installers. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will introduce new regulations on safety standards for appliances, including imported appliances.

The Bill is good for the industry, for consumers and for the nation. As a result of the Bill we shall see a continuation of the Government's policy of returning the assets of the nation to the people. The number of shareholders in this country has doubled since 1979 because of the policies of the Government. The Bill takes wider share ownership another great step forward. I ask the House to support the Third Reading of the Bill.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Adjournment (Easter and May Day)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House, at its rising on Thursday 27th March, do adjourn until Tuesday 8th April and, at its rising on Friday 2nd May, do adjourn until Tuesday 6th May; and the House shall not adjourn on Thursday 27th March until Mr. Speaker shall have reported the Royal Assent to any Acts which have been agreed upon by both Houses.—[Mr. Durant.]

7.14 pm

Mr. John Silkin (Lewisham, Deptford): I do not wish the Adjournment motion to pass without a protest from the Opposition Benches on behalf of those whose views ought to be heeded by the Government but whom the Government choose to ignore. I am talking about those who are not able to make the tax-free gains from shares that the Chancellor envisages, because neither the Budget nor their employers provide them with enough money to be able to purchase shares in the first place.

There are two early-day motions on the Order Paper, Nos. 204 and 217, about speech therapists, and they are signed by hon. Members from both major political parties. I should like to speak about speech therapists and to quote from a letter from a constituent of mine who is a speech therapist. She says:

"I am the only speech therapist at the hospital and have sole responsibility for the assessment, diagnosis, treatment and discharge of all cases requiring speech therapy.

The caseload comprises mainly stroke patients and head injuries, but also voice cases, including laryngectomies, and patients suffering from progressing disorders.

The hospital houses a stroke unit where patients are offered intensive treatment.

I am responsible for training and liaison with all other relevant staff, including lecturing to doctors, nurses and physiotherapists.

I am required to advise, inform and assist relatives and patients in dealing with the emotional trauma which inevitably accompanies stroke or head injury.

Other responsibilities include clinical training of final year speech therapy students (for which I receive extra payment) and organising and running a stroke club (a voluntary evening activity without payment or time in lieu).

I have worked for 12 years in the NHS following a three-year training course and also hold a first-class honours degree in psychology, and this year will be earning £9,175."

Until recently, speech therapy was an all-female profession, and is still more than 99 per cent. female.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): That is why they receive such low pay.

Mr. Silkin: As my hon. Friend rightly says, that is why they receive such low pay. However, it is not only the 99-plus per cent. women who are badly paid. Men are only marginally better paid.

Another constituent of mine is a speech therapist, and after five years of study and four years work in the service he earns £10,033 a year. He is marginally better off than my woman constituent, but for a responsible job like that such low pay is a scandal and a disgrace. It is made worse by the fact that speech therapists are now required to undergo a four-year degree course before they can practise. That helps them and it helps the patients, but it does not help the salaries. It is not that the Government have wrong priorities: they have no priorities at all.

If we examine the record of the National Health Service, we see that in a week's time there will be a rise in prescription charges. When Labour left office in 1979 the prescription charge was 20p, and it will go up to £2·20 next week. That is 1,100 per cent. inflation in the cost of treatment under this Government. In addition, the Government have deliberately forced the authorities to give contracts for cleaning and laundry to private individuals at bargain basement rates. They are proposing to sell nurses' homes.

When only those who administer direct help and those who suffer are penalised, it is time to wonder what is happening to the National Health Service. When the NHS has increased its bureaucracy by about 68,000 to a record of nearly 800,000 people—68,000 more than in 1979—we are entitled to wonder what priorities, if any, the Government have. When the payment of speech therapists is an affront, not just to their professional qualifications, but to the hopes and aspirations of their patients, we should query that.

I talked about the profession being badly paid, and my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) rightly said that that was because speech therapy was entirely a female profession. There had been a promise to discuss equal pay. The management side on the Whitley council agreed to do so a few months ago, but I am told that only yesterday the management side of the Whitley council, I suspect encouraged by the Government, said that it would not discuss that matter.

One understands that there are precedents to be created. There is an overall issue, that perhaps the Government do not wish to see go beyond speech therapists into the NHS and Government service generally, but in this case, if in no other—it should be in all other cases as well—there is more than a reason why, if we are to keep our speech therapists and see that the patients benefit, that question should be dealt with immediately.

I do not want to detain the House any longer than is necessary, but if we do not deal with the matter now it will not be raised in the usual conflict between the parties—the right and proper conflict that there should be. The matter will simply be ignored and forgotten, as always happens when a small group of people, however intelligent and articulate, are far fewer in number that the general mass about whom we talk.

I hope that the Leader of the House will, as he has always done in the past when I have raised questions with him, make the necessary inquiries of the Department, and perhaps even write to me in due course, to see whether we can do something to assist those who, according to the two early-day motions about which I spoke, 160 right hon. and hon. Members feel should get a far better deal than they are getting at the moment.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I have some sympathy with the point raised by the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin). I have been approached by speech therapists in my constituency, and I know what a marvellous job they do because I have seen examples of their work.

I want to refer to another medical matter today. I do not want the House to adjourn without my having the opportunity to draw the attention of the House and Ministers in the Department of Health and Social Security to the growing public disquiet over the powers of the General Medical Council to discipline doctors. That disquiet has been heightened by the tragic case of Harriet English from my constituency.

We are all too familiar with the widely reported and lasciviously read cases of doctors' sexual activities with patients, but rather more rarely do we read of cases of doctors' incompetence, although such cases are often of far greater importance and have far more dangerous consequences than the lurid cases that attract the popular press.

The powers of the GMC derive from the Medical Act 1983. Under section 36 no sanctions or remedies are available unless the conduct of the practitioner concerned is judged to be "serious professional misconduct".

At this stage I want to refer to the tragic case of Harriet English, the daughter of my agent in Cambridgeshire, South-West. I raised the matter in the House last July. Briefly, Harriet, aged 22, a perfectly fit and athletic girl, felt tired after playing badminton and taking other exercise and she later complained of a pain in the shoulder. General practitioner Dr. Barretto was consulted. He diagnosed a torn ligament and administered an injection of cortisone. He did not inquire whether Harriet was right or left-handed, which was relevant, he did not take her temperature, and he did not take her blood pressure. Later, in his absence, Harriet was similarly treated by his partners, Dr. Ryan and Dr. Page. She became extremely ill during the subsequent four days and was rushed to the London clinic, where, in agonising circumstances, she died of septicemia which had at no time previously been diagnosed.

I shall not weary the House with the details of the inquest and the complex subsequent investigations by medical experts. Suffice it to say that ultimately a case alleging serious professional misconduct was brought against Dr. Barretto and Dr. Ryan and it was heard by the GMC disciplinary committee on 18 March 1986. Learned counsel were involved and experts were called on both sides. Not surprisingly, they expressed differing views. But one expert, Dr. Martin Wood, attested that Harriet's symptoms should have alerted Dr. Barretto to the fact that she was suffering from something more than a torn ligament.

However, the GMC's decision — from which I understand there is no appeal, except on a point of law to the Privy Council — was that serious professional misconduct was not proved and the doctors were cleared. Nevertheless, the case left unanswered questions of competence and acceptability of conduct. No alternative charge is available to the GMC under the Medical Act. Where medical conduct is "unacceptable" — to use a phrase of the GMC in its handbook — no remedy or penalty is provided.

The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), whom I am pleased to see in his place, is a leading campaigner on the issue and has a private Member's Bill which seeks to amend section 36 of the Medical Act 1983 so as to provide that unacceptable professional conduct can be brought in as an alternative. He can cite a number of cases to support the argument, as can other hon. Members, in particular the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse). The GMC maintains that the additional powers proposed in the Bill would not be helpful.

I must quote from a letter that the hon. Member for Newham, South has given to me, which he received from the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security on 12 March 1986. It says:

"The Council"—

the General Medical Council—

"maintains that the additional power that you propose"— in the hon. Gentleman's Bill—

[Sir Anthony Grant]

"would not be helpful because it might lead to a tendency to substitute the lesser for the more serious finding which in the longer term would be likely to weaken rather than strengthen the public's confidence in the Council's disciplinary powers."

That is an extremely curious argument. It is rather like saying that the only motoring offence should be dangerous driving, without the alternative offence of driving without due care and attention; or, indeed, that the only charge for causing death should be murder, with no charge of manslaughter or unlawful homicide.

All this basically stems from the Merrison report in 1975, Cmnd. 6018, from which the constitutional powers of the GMC derive. Paragraph 10 states:

"It is important to understand in this context that the GMC is merely the instrument for the proper supervision of this contract"— that is, between the public and the profession—

"and that it derives its authority, and indeed its being, from legislation."

The report goes on:

"The legislature"—

that is, Parliament—

"acts in this context for the public, and it is for Parliament to decide the nature of the contract and the way it is be executed."

Therefore, this matter to which I draw attention is essentially for Parliament.

Of course, we all know that the overwhelming majority of doctors do their duty supremely well. Only a tiny minority are guilty of serious professional misconduct. A slightly larger minority, but still a minority, indulge in professional conduct that is "unacceptable", in GMC terms. Nevertheless, I believe that there is growing public anxiety, which my case illustrates, which would be relieved by the reform that I have described and that is contained in the private Member's Bill to which I have referred.

As I said in the House last year, my constituents Richard and Ann English know that nothing can bring back their beloved daughter, but they hope, as I do, that others may be spared Harriet's tragic fate. I ask the Ministers concerned to give this whole matter their most careful and sympathetic consideration.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I am sure that all hon. Members wish the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) good fortune in pursuing the case of Harriet English, which is clearly worthy of the attention of those on the Treasury Bench and all hon. Members of the House. I hope, too, that when the chance comes to debate the private Member's Bill it will be given widespread support.

Tonight I should like to widen the debate to the question of Nepalese Christians, which is perhaps especially topical in view of the recent visits to Nepal by Her Majesty the Queen and our Foreign Secretary.

Just after Christmas, an Anglo-American human rights team which included myself and the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) travelled to Nepal to examine allegations of torture and brutality against the small Christian minority there. Our objectives included the following: first, nationwide tolerance for Christians accused of violating the constitution as it relates to their religion at every level of the judicial system; secondly, an end to the arbitrary harassment of accused Christians during the judicial process; thirdly, recognition of the right to reasonable and judicious bail; fourthly, equal protection under the law for the Christian population; fifthly, an end to the confiscation of bibles; and, sixthly, movement towards changing Nepalese law to conform to the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, to which Nepal subscribes.

During our delegation's visit to Nepal we travelled over 1,000 miles in six days and took evidence from many people. In remote villages and towns and in the capital, Kathmandu, we met hundreds of people and, in subsequent interviews with the Law and Justice Secretary and the Foreign Minister, Mr. Ranodhir Subbha, we instanced many examples of human rights violations. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, East and I subsequently presented the Nepalese Government and the Nepalese ambassador here in London with transcripts corroborating our findings.

Before her Majesty the Queen and the Foreign Secretary went to Nepal, we met the latter and outlined our concerns. I regret that the Under-Secretary, in his reply on 31 January to a question that I tabled, said that he had virtually no power to intervene and thought it really not appropriate for the British Government to monitor the situation in Nepal. He said:

"Allegations about the treatment of Nepalese citizens in Nepal are an internal matter for the Government of that country: We have no locus standi to intervene."—[Official Report, 31 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 646.]:

He went on to say that Her Majesty's embassy at Kathmandu was in regular contact with Christian leaders and missionary societies in Nepal.

Certainly, when I met Ambassador Hurrell in Nepal he was in contact with Christian leaders, particularly the Rev. Charles Mendies, and he had heard from them first hand of some of the allegations which we have instanced both to the Nepalese authorities and to the Foreign Office.

While I was disappointed at that reply, I was pleased that, following the interview with the Foreign Secretary, he took the opportunity when in Nepal to raise these important matters with his opposite number, and in a letter which was sent subsequently he said:

"During the visit I took the opportunity to raise informally with the Nepalese Foreign Minister the alleged persecution of Christians in Nepal. Mr. Subbha said that he understood our concern. He was very concerned about the allegations of torture, and told me that these were being investigated. I was also able to speak to a number of missionaries working in Nepal and to tell them of our interest in their situation.

I can assure you that the treatment of Christians in Nepal is a matter which we shall continue to monitor closely."

While I am grateful for that change of attitude on the part of the Foreign Office, I still believe that there is a deal of misapprehension both by Members of the House and by people from the journalists' corps, who constantly present Nepal as some sort of romantic Arcadia, infinitely tolerant in its treatment of minorities. This simply does not square with reality.

If, without going into great detail on the report, I give two quotations to the Leader of the House, he will get the general thrust of the statements which were made to us when we visited Nepal. The first says:

"they beat our brother and he was hung up and beat and kept at night in stocks. And then he became very sick and after he was released a few days later he passed away. And still in that particular village there is intensified persecution of the Christians."

The second quotation says:

"the four of us who were in a separate group were kept in a separate jail, and all night we were beaten by the police. Our feet were kept in stocks and we were beaten on the soles of our feet . . . And even after three months when we were released we were not able to walk properly."

In a letter to The Times, the Nepalese ambassador to the Court of St. James, Mr. Ishwari Pandey, stated:

"an individual can freely practise his faith" and may "change his faith". Regrettably, that is not true. By law, citizens may not evangelise, nor may they convert to Christianity. If this law is transgressed, they face up to six years in jail. In 1985 alone, over 80 people were charged with "preaching Christianity" and causing a "disturbance to Hinduism."

Mr. Pandey has also strongly asserted on more than one occasion that "not a single drop of blood has ever been shed in the name of religion".

During the time that we were taking evidence, especially in the east Nepalese town of Dahran, witness after witness described beatings and acts of brutality meted out by local officials—incidents which are hardly consistent with the ambassador's claim.

Mr. Subbha, the Nepalese Foreign Minister and a most gracious man, is a strong advocate of King Birendra's foreign affairs initiative to create a zone of peace in the region. He is also totally committed to his country's participation in international organisations such as the United Nations. But a failure by his Government to curb the excesses of fanatical local zealots can only undermine Nepal's reputation and bring his laudable attempts to create a zone of peace into ridicule. Nor will the West be able to take seriously a country whose code of law directly contradicts article 18 of the United Nations convention on human rights:

"Everyone should have the right to freedom to have or adopt a religion or belief of his choice, and freedom, either individually or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in worship, observance, practice and teaching."

Not only are Nepal's 35,000 Christians denied this right, but they are subject to arbitrary harassment, humiliation and persecution. Once they are charged, cases are postponed, and bail is set at ludicrously high levels. Sometimes bail is used punitively, and we found examples of the bail of Christians being confiscated even on acquittal.

There is also clearly one law for foreigners and another for the indigenous Nepalese. Last March 14 members of a group called YWAM—Youth With a Mission—were arrested in a town called Dahding for staging a puppet show illustrating gospel stories. The 14 were held for seven days in a cell measuring 9 ft by 12 ft. The conditions were indescribably bad. The charges against the foreign contingent were dropped, but the five young Nepalese in the group face up to six years in prison.

Other Christians told us of obstacles placed in their path. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, East and I saw a Bible school which had been closed. We heard how Mother Teresa's nuns have a centre for the destitute and dying in the shadow of Kathmandu's Pashupatinath Hindu temple, but the authorities have refused them permission to open a leprosarium.

The Jesuits operated a rehabilitation centre for drug addicts under the supervision of Father Tom Gafrey. Heroin addiction, one of the more malign western influences, has reached epidemic proportions there. Yet Mr. Tek Bahadur Thapa, of the Nepalese narcotic drug control office, refused to extend visas for the Christians who manned the centre. So Nepal's only drug rehabilitation centre was forced to close last August.

Nepal is understandably worried about western influences, and some humility is required of the heirs of "rice Christianity". But past excesses do not excuse present intolerance. Nor do they exonerate gross distortions by the Nepalese Government-controlled press. The comments of the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East were grossly distorted and deftly turned around to give entirely the opposite meaning. Our findings were completely suppressed and the only story that appeared carried the headline:

"Christian delegation satisfied with community's lot."

Nothing could have been further from the truth.

Since our visit, matters have not improved. Two more people have been arrested to join the over 80 others who were arrested last year. Secondly, evidence has been given to us about discrimination against Christians in the Gurkha regiments. This has been provided by Mr. Byatt, former civilian lecturer in English in the Brigade of Gurkhas training depot.

Mr. Byatt worked from January 1980 to the end of February 1984 in the training depot. He noted that the Christians in the depot were not given the opportunity to worship. He also discovered actual discrimination against those who wanted to change their documents to declare the fact that they had become Christians. In the brigade, recruits have their forms automatically stamped "Hindu" to ease the flow of registration.

New recruits are not permitted to leave the depot during the first nine months of their training. In consequence, Christians are not permitted to attend the church services. The Anglican church of St. Martin's is in the next-door depot, but it remains out of bounds to recruits. The anomaly arises because recruits are obliged to attend Hindu temple service. Recruits may also go swimming, under supervision, in the next-door camp, in the pool that is next to the church.

The recruits are billeted in a camp called Malaga Lines, and this is separated from the other depot, called Borneo Lines, by an air strip. One Christian Gurkha wanted to attend church, but was not permitted to do so under camp regulations although he desperately wanted to go. He told his mother that the hardest part of serving in the Gurkhas was not being allowed to go to church.

The second major act of discrimination is more serious. In 1972, one Gurkha soldier wanted to change his documents to register the fact that he had become a Christian. He was unsuccessful, and had to recant in the face of dismissal. That is unacceptable.

Nepal is a beautiful country and the Nepalese have much to be proud of, but it still has grievous economic and social problems. Some 77 per cent. are illiterate, life expectancy is only 45 years and there is an infant mortality rate of 150 deaths out of every 1,000 live births. There is an annual average per capita income of only £100 a year, with an inflation rate of 14 per cent. and a recent devaluation of 20 per cent. Britain should boost its meagre £10 million aid programme to help to combat the unrelieved endemic poverty.

There are many other ways in which our two countries could help each other, and much that we could teach each other. Inevitably, a prerequisite of closer relations is mutual tolerance of each other's minorities. Her Majesty's Government should not turn a blind eye to the plight of

[Mr. David Alton]

Nepalese Christians. I hope that, when the Leader of the House replies, he will be able to give an assurance that continual monitoring of the condition of Christians in Nepal will be undertaken by Her Majesty's representatives there.

7.42 pm

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): The House listened with concern to the speech made by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton). I know nothing of the details of what he describes, but Nepal is a country with which we have always had close relations, and in particular the Gurhkas stand high in the admiration of the British people. I am sure that what the hon. Gentleman has said will be considered closely by Ministers.

I shall raise three important matters, of which the first is agriculture. It is important that we should have a clear statement from the Government — whether it comes before the House rises for the Easter recess or shortly afterwards — of their overall strategy for agriculture. I can remember sitting where the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) is sitting under the five years of Labour Government, and listening to Lord Peart, as he now is, and the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) producing White Papers for the expansion of agriculture. I can remember my right hon. Friend the member for Worcester (Mr. Walker) doing the same thing for a Conservative Government.

Clearly the rules and realities have changed. We all accept that surpluses must be controlled. The problem must be tackled, but it is essential that we do something to restore the morale of agriculture, because it does not know where it is supposed to be going, nor what it is supposed to do instead of growing unwanted surpluses. I strongly emphasise to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House that I should like him to ask my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to prepare a White Paper setting out a strategy for agriculture in the new reality of a time of surplus, in which production must be restrained. Whether we address problems such as "set-aside", or other techniques of dealing with such problems, we must set a new strategy.

The second matter is a constituency issue, but one of considerable importance to my constituents concerning the Ministry of Defence. At the moment, the Ministry has a mania of trying to merge service institutions. As a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I am partly responsible for the recent report which showed the ridiculous nonsense over the proposed joint music school. I hope that Ministers will take that report seriously.

A similar move is being contemplated in my constituency. There is an inquiry into a proposal to close RAF North Luffenham. This would mean the movement of up to 930 RAF personnel, the loss of 150 civilian jobs and the loss of £250,000 worth of rate income to the local authority. Such a move would be extremely unwelcome in my constituency. I have made it clear to Lord Trefgarne that if he proceeds with these proposals he can expect my strongest possible opposition, and I am bringing a delegation from the local council to see him next month.

Lord Trefgarne is also proposing to close the dog school at the Royal Army Veterinary Corps at Melton Mowbray, and move that to RAF Newton in Nottinghamshire. Both of these schemes are extremely poorly thought out. The costings have been far from adequately done, and I make it clear to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and Lord Trefgarne that the latter can expect much trouble from me if these suggestions are carried out. I sincerely hope that they will not be. My right hon. Friend knows me well enough to know that that is not necessarily an idle threat.

The third matter is one on which I have recently made myself a pain in the neck to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House — the Shops Bill. My right hon. Friend would be doing the House and the Conservative party a service if he said in advance what concessions the Government are willing to make on the Bill. It would be difficult if the Government tried to proceed in this House in the same way as they proceeded in the other place — that is, by rejecting every amendment in unequivocal terms. This is a matter on which many Conservative Members feel strongly. For example, many of us have long been concerned about the situation that pertains on Good Friday, which is now becoming an ordinary working day for a great many people. This is unacceptable to Christians, and I do not want to see it happening to Sundays.

My right hon. Friend and I had a semi-joking exchange on this matter last Thursday, during business questions. I hope that he will use the recess to consult his colleagues and consider what can be done to meet the real concerns of many hon. Members on both sides of the House and large numbers of people outside, and to try to get a sensible and workable measure on the statute books, and one that will not offend large numbers of people.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): I hope that the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) will not mind if I do not follow him in detail, although I shall speak about the Ministry of Defence.

I hope that the House will not adjourn for the Easter recess until we have considered the Crown Proceedings Act 1947, section 10. This section deprived service men and ex-service men of the right to sue for negligence, no matter how gravely or seriously disabled they may be. It also deprives the families of service men who have been killed by negligence of the right to sue. Not only that, but it deprives them of the information — to which they are entitled — about what happened. In talking to many of the families involved, and certainly many of the ex-service men involved, one finds a deep feeling about the lack of information — information to which they have been refused access by the Ministry of Defence.

The Ministry of Defence has an appalling record when it comes to discussing the rights of service men and ex-service men which are relevant to section 10. The Ministry of Defence says that they are public servants, but other public servants have the right to sue when they are damaged by negligence or their dependants have the right to sue if they are killed by negligence. Police and firemen have that right but apparently service men must be denied it. It is wrong to deprive service men, or their dependants when they are killed, of that right.

What are the arguments of the Ministry of Defence for keeping this outrageous anachronism? First, it says that there is no easy dividing line between military and other action. That is nonsense. Any service man or anyone who has been in the firing line can soon put it right about what is military action and what is not. Therefore, there is no problem of definition.

Secondly, the Ministry of Defence says that discipline would be affected if service men or ex-service men were given that right. Of course, that is nonsense. Legal redress has nothing to do with discipline. The Ministry of Defence cannot use that bogus argument. Thirdly, it says that negligence is hard to prove. Of course it is hard to prove, but it is also hard to prove in civil cases. The proof should be decided not by the Minister or his civil servants but by a court of law. If a claim is to be made it should be decided upon by the courts, so there is no argument for saying that it is hard to prove.

Fourthly, the Minister says—Ministers have said this in parliamentary answers—that section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 has existed for 38 years and therefore it must be pretty good. There could not be a more bogus argument than that. In fact, the existence of that section for 38 years has outraged service men and ex-service men over the years. It has caused very great distress to them. Simply because it has existed for so long does not mean that it is satisfactory. When section 10 was introduced in 1947 by a Labour Government—this is a non-party political matter—the then Attorney-General, Sir Hartley Shawcross, gave a clear impression that, even though the section must be brought in, the awards of compensation would not in any way be diminished. He was not speaking of any specific award but he said that, overall, service men would be entitled to the same kind of pension as other people would get, or would have got if they had recourse to law. Experience proves that that is quite wrong. Service men are now deprived of adequate compensation, even though they may be severely damaged by negligence.

An organisation has now been set up called the Section Ten Abolition Group, STAG for short. It is a group of ex-service men who are deeply angered and embittered by the attitude of the Ministry of Defence over the years. Its chairman is Mrs. Carol Mills and she is doing a marvellous job in combining and unifying the people who are involved.

Mrs. Mills and her husband lost their son in especially tragic circumstances. He was burnt to death when a missile backfired. The family have been deprived of the right to information about the death of their son. I think that they are entitled to it. They have certainly been deprived of the right to sue for damages. They are not after the money; it is the principle involved.

Mrs. Mills and her husband came with me to see the Secretary of State for Defence on a deputation a few weeks ago. They are parents whose son had been appallingly burned and died and they think that it was due to negligence. Also on that deputation was one of my constituents, Martin Ketterick. He is now paralysed from the waist down and is appallingly disabled. The accident occurred when a rope was cut as he was abseiling down a cliff. He thinks that that was due to negligence. Those are clearly very sad and tragic cases and those people presented their case to the Secretary of State.

Let me place it on record that the Secretary of State listened carefully to what we all had to say and gave us a very good reception and response. I pay tribute to him for the way in which he received that deputation. It was a splendid response. He did not commit himself, he could not commit himself, and I did not expect him to. However, I am making these remarks now because I want to press the Ministry of Defence, including the Secretary of State. I have no confidence in the Ministry of Defence, as distinct from the Secretary of State, because the same civil servants are advising this Secretary of State as have advised successive Secretaries of State for years. They have badly advised Ministers and they have given all the excuses that I have presented to the House.

I hope that the Secretary of State will bring forward legislation. I hope that he will abolish section 10 of the Act. If he does—or whatever he does—I hope that there will be retrospective provisions. If there is not, Mr. and Mrs. Mills, Martin Ketterick and all the service men who attended the inaugural meeting which I set up in the Jubilee Room at the House of Commons will be deprived of the rights which I hope will be given to service men and women in the future. It would be quite wrong to exclude them after all their campaigning.

If the Secretary of State feels unable to help, these ex-service men and the relatives of those who have died under what we think are circumstances of negligence, may find it necessary to parade outside the Ministry of Defence and outside recruiting offices to let potential recruits know that they are denied the right to sue for negligence which is given to all public servants. We hope that it will not be necessary. I do not think that it will be necessary because of the way in which the Secretary of State received us and responded to us. I hope that in his response he will show that there is no justification for depriving service men of this basic right and that he will act accordingly as soon as possible.

Sir Julian Ridsdale (Harwich): I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity of saying how disappointed I was to read the announcement in The Daily Telegraph today that a House of Commons written answer yesterday said that an early Bill will be introduced, presumably in the next Queen's Speech, to transfer pilots to the control of harbour authorities. It also said that Trinity House is to lose its responsibility as the principal pilotage authority of Britain's harbours after almost 500 years.

I have been doing my best to prevent the need for that legislation over the past 15 months. For that work and the help that I have given to pilots over the years as the Member for Harwich, a few weeks ago I received an honorary pilot's licence from the Deputy Master of Trinity House. I feel that I should declare that interest.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West (Mr. Mitchell), because when he was Under-Secretary of State for Transport he took great care and trouble to bring all the interested parties together. If he had stayed in that post and the Department had not been so hopelessly overworked, I believe that he would have succeeded. But I still believe that it is possible to proceed without legislation.

I am glad to have had this opportunity to appeal over the head of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I appeal to her to find time to tell my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, as soon as possible, to make one more effort to reach agreement between the parties concerned. The proposal for legislation is that pilotage should be placed under the port authorities, and pilots should give up their fee-earning, self-employed status and become the employees of the port authorities. Indeed, the very same proposal came from a report chaired by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) in 1966.

Now port authorities are local authorities, and have the same behaviour patterns, both managerial and fiscal, as other local authorities. At a time when the Government are seeking to curb the power of local authorities and to privatise services within them, is it not an anachronism and an anomaly that a group of self-employed, fee-earning people should face with being taken over by such a group? Do we really want to take the control of pilots away from Trinity House after 500 years? I have yet to find a good reason for doing so. Do we really want to weaken the authority of an institution that has been doing its job for so long?

For my part, I could not support such legislation, and I know that many of my hon. Friends feel very strongly about the issue. That is why I appeal to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to tell the Secretary of State to make one more effort to reach agreement, and that is why I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me and enabling me to make this eleventh hour appeal to prevent such legislation. It does not in any way follow the political principles in which I or many of my hon. Friends, believe.

8.2 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): It is a pleasure to speak after the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) because, like him, I shall raise a maritime matter. I hope that he will find it interesting. It involves a defence issue, and I know he has a special interest in defence matters.

I urge hon. Members not to agree to adjourn for the recess until we have discussed the impending decision on the auxiliary oiler replenishment vessel. The issue is of enormous importance to my constituents, to the north-east and to our national defence. I shall briefly outline the background to it.

In 1979, Swan Hunter was commissioned by the Ministry of Defence to carry out a feasibility study for a new generation of fleet replenishment vessels called AORs. The AOR is designed to complement the type 23 frigate, providing fuel, provisions, maintenance, and extra helicopters, as well as its own defence systems. It operates at a speed compatible with the type 23 frigate, and without the AOR the type 23 frigate programme makes no sense.

When Swan Hunter, the major shipyard in my constituency, was privatised, it was sold as a supplier of warships, in particular of fleet auxiliaries, to the Royal Navy. Over the past 25 years Swan Hunter has supplied the Royal Navy with 32 per cent. of all the Royal Navy's surface warships, 39 per cent. of all its amphibious vessels and, most importantly, 84 per cent. of all major royal fleet auxiliaries.

The importance of major royal fleet auxiliaries as a source of work for Swan Hunter was stressed a year or two years ago when I met the hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), who was then a Minister at the Department of Trade and Industry. He emphasised that Swan Hunter should look to that area for its future. Unfortunately, times have changed. Yet it is significant that the only AOR vessel to be built in the United Kingdom is the Kharg, which was built at Swan Hunter.

Although Swan Hunter is a shadow of its former self, it is still the country's premier shipbuilder. The AOR order is crucial to its survival as a major shipbuilder, so I am sure that hon. Members will readily understand my feelings and those of other Members of Parliament for the north-east, when we learned last week, through press leaks, that the order for the AORs was to be placed with Harland and Wolff. That is a devastating blow to the north-east of England and to the shipbuilding community that I represent. Perhaps more importantly, such a decision would be wrong and irrational on almost every single possible criterion.

I readily understand that to this Government cost is the most important criterion. Swan Hunter is a private sector company. It wins orders with competitive prices. Harland and Wolff uses public subsidies. It is important to remember that we are discussing pricing for a market that Harland and Wolff has not been in for 20 years, but Swan Hunter gets the majority of its business from that market.

It is widely rumoured that Harland and Wolff's bid for the AOR is below that of Swan Hunter. I fear that Harland and Wolff has been able to reduce its price because of cross-subsidy. Last year, Harland and Wolff received £37 million from the British taxpayer, and I fear that that financial assistance could give it the competitive edge. We are assured that there is no cross-subsidy, but it is impossible to tell until after the event. If there is no cross-subsidy, we may have an independent inquiry, conducted by Mr. Graham Day, or some other shipbuilder of national repute, into the state of affairs at Harland and Wolff. I understand from Swan Hunter that it would be only too willing to have a similar inquiry into its circumstances. Of course, Swan Hunter is privately owned, and there can be no question of cross-subsidy, and so on.

What will happen if price drift occurs afterwards? If Swan Hunter wins the order and there is price drift, the cost will be borne by the management. Their homes and private assets are on the line. But if Harland and Wolff has the order and there is price drift, the British taxpayer will have to pay. If John Parker, the chairman of Harland and Wolff, is so sure that there will be no price drift and is not just kidding the Prime Minister, let him and his management team put their homes and private assets on the line. I challenge him to do that. Last year, his wages rose to £67,000, which represented a rise of 45 per cent. That was not quite in line with Harland and Wolff's losses, which rose by only 20 per cent. to £36 million. I challenge him to put his assets on the line and to guarantee that he will personally take up any losses occasioned by price rises. But that will be too late for Swan Hunter, because it will be in extraordinarily dire straits if it does not get the order.

The argument about sub-contractors affecting the overall tender is sometimes advanced. Swan Hunter has allowed for that, but last year Harland and Wolff complained that the losses on its sub-contractors accounted for a substantial part of its overall losses. What guarantee is there that that will not happen again, and that the taxpayer will not have to pick up the bill? If that happens at Swan Hunter, the management and owners will have to pick up the bill. Is it fair that a company in the private sector, with only private resources, should be invited to tender for an order for which the Government originally said the private sector should fight, only to find itself fighting against a company that the Government own?

The AOR vessel is crucial to the type 23 programme. Without it, the type 23 programme is nonsense. It must be delivered on time if the very first of the type 23 frigates are to play the part that they are designed to play in our defence.

Let us consider Swan Hunter's delivery record. HMS Ark Royal, York, Illustrious and Exeter were all delivered ahead of schedule and within budget. That should be compared with the abysmal and lamentable record of Harland and Wolff.

The very first AOR—the lead vessel—must be there on time, yet, if the press leaks are correct, it is to be entrusted to the Belfast shipyard of Harland and Wolff. What a weapon for those in that community who wish to make political mischief. They would have a chance to undermine the main thrust of the Royal Navy's defence towards the end of this century.

What will be the effects on our community if we do not obtain the order? There will be 2,000 redundancies at Swan Hunter, reducing the work force to just over 2,000. We have just endured 2,800 redundancies in a community that already has one of the highest levels of unemployment in the country. With those further redundancies, unemployment in Newcastle upon Tyne, East would be the highest in the country, including Northern Ireland. That is something that our community could not endure.

The design team at Swan Hunter is a national asset. Swan Hunter had hoped that it would help the company to win orders. It is one of the aspects of the business that gives the company a competitive edge. That team will be broken up, and it will be impossible to reassemble it.

Having outlined the depressing effects on our community, I should like to urge the Government to consider a compromise. It would be possible to share the work between Harland and Wolff and Swan Hunter. If the first lead vessel were given to Swan Hunter, the second could be placed with Harland and Wolff. Swan Hunter needs the work immediately. The redundancies will be declared as soon as it is announced that the work is to go to Harland and Wolff. At Harland and Wolff there is sufficient work until 1987, when the second vessel would come on stream. The two yards could co-operate to their mutual benefit, and the Ministry of Defence would share that advantage.

I ask the Government to consider factors other than price. If that is held to be an unreasonable demand in this era of competition and free markets, may I say that the last time the Ministry of Defence was ordering frigates, the previous Secretary of State felt quite free to place a type 22 frigate, which Swan Hunter had won in competitive tender, with Cammell Laird instead at an extra cost to the British taxpayer of £9 million. He made a decision on social grounds. It may have been perfectly proper to do so, but our community paid the price; and it seems that we are to pay the price on the AOR, too.

I conclude on two points of principle. First, can it be right for a privatised company, trying to fight in a difficult market, to be forced to compete with a state-subsidised enterprise? Like is not being compared with like. The owners, management and work force of Swan Hunter are 100 per cent. behind the company. The energy and effort that the directors and owners of Swan Hunter put into the bids made over the weekend in trying to achieve the reversal of what was understood to be an inevitable decision—trying to make an eleventh hour appeal to the Government to reconsider the position—is testament to their will to survive and to the will of the community that shipbuilding should survive on Tyneside. They deserve credit for that.

Secondly, there is the broader politics of the situation. Last Thursday, the Prime Minister courteously received me and my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett). The right hon. Lady took an interest in the situation, and I am grateful to her for that. But I must emphasise that Tyneside fears that it will be paying the price for the Anglo-Irish agreement. If so, that would be grotesquely unfair. It would not be in the national interest, and it would certainly not be in the interests of the community that I represent.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): I wish to raise one local and one national matter. I am sure that the problems of itinerants or gipsies have from time to time concerned most hon. Members. There is currently a problem in Derby over a specific site, and the matter has been referred to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

A dispute has arisen between two local authorities over the suitability of land at Chequers lane in my constituency as a site for itinerants. Both the authorities are controlled by the Labour party. Derby city council takes the view that the land is inappropriate for that purpose, and I concur with that view. The county council takes a different view. In my view the county council is wrong, for a number of reasons. First, valid objections and public opinion on the matter appear to have been disregarded. A petition has been signed by 1,495 people and presented to me, and a delegation went to the county offices at Matlock, but so far it appears that the views expressed have been dismissed by the county councillors.

There is an alternative use for the site—an industrial use. The land is ideal for industrial development, and in my view should be so used. I feel that any other development of the Chequers lane site would be detrimental to, or at any rate not harmonious with, adjoining industry.

I should like to read brief extracts from two of a number of letters that I have received. The first is from the chief executive of Bemrose Corporation, who says:

> "We genuinely believe that location of a permanent gipsy site at Chequers Lane could seriously damage our security business and jeopardise employment prospects in this part of Derby. This view is shared by adjacent employers and in particular by Joseph Mason plc and Sawley Packaging which is owned by Rolls Royce . . . Bemrose does support the alternative proposal for development of the site for industrial purposes."

The writer makes a number of other comments.

I have also had a letter from the managing director of Joseph Mason, paint manufacturers, who says:

> "We are not against the principle of provision of a gipsy site, but we can see no merit whatsoever in immersing such a site in the centre of such a vital and sensitive industrial area . . . The site is also bounded by the very busy A52 arterial road. This stretch of A52 has already resulted in the loss of life of children without, at present, any adjacent dwellings. To place a gipsy site within throwing distance of this road appears madness."

The proximity of the A52 to the site presents a potential danger to children. I am also not happy about the fact that the site is adjacent to a large cemetery. There is a far more suitable site to the north of the city, just outside the city boundary. I ask the Minister to convey my comments to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. There are serious objections to the proposed use of the site, and I hope that they will be passed on.

The other matter is of national importance. I am referring to the dangerous and growing use and abuse of crossbows in Britain. An item in today's Daily Telegraph is typical of many news reports of the past couple of years. It is headed:

"Probation for Crossbow Attack Man".

The report begins:

"A man who fired a crossbow bolt through a neighbour's leg in a row over water dripping from a balcony in a block of flats was placed on probation for two years and ordered to live in a special hostel by Bromley magistrates yesterday."

That shows the growing menace that innocent people face from the misuse of crossbows. People, pets and animals up and down the country are being injured and are at risk. It was reported to me that a shopkeeper who sells these items made the comment that restrictions are unnecessary because we are talking only about bows and arrows. We are not talking only about bows and arrows. We are talking about a highly sophisticated weapon that is based on a metal frame. In some instances, it can cause damage up to a quarter of a mile away.

It may be said that the misuse of crossbows is to some extent covered by the present law. I accept that the Prevention of Crime Act 1953, for example, makes it an offence to possess any offensive weapon in a public place without lawful authority or reasonable excuse. Furthermore, in many areas local byelaws prohibit the discharge of missiles in a street or public place.

The existing law is attempting to tackle the problem after an offence has been committed. Our law does not always follow this principle. For example, the view is taken that shotguns are so dangerous that the law should seek to prevent offences from being committed by the restriction of ownership. The time has come when the House ought to consider adopting similar measures for crossbows. It is a growing problem.

I ask my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to urge the Home Secretary to treat crossbows in the same manner as shotguns and introduce a licensing system. I accept that a licensing system would impose additional duties on the police and that it would cost money, but a licensing system would do something else. At the very least, it would reduce injury and suffering both to animals and to man. In my view, new restrictions would do more. They would probably save lives.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I do not believe that it can altogether be an accident that so many of the subjects that have been raised in this debate relate to the Ministry of Defence. The hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) referred to crossbows. That is an important matter, with which we should be concerned.

I do not think that the House should adjourn without discussing what is happening to the royal ordnance factories. The royal ordnance factory Radway Green was in my constituency until the boundaries were redrawn. It now lies in the constituency of the hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton). That factory has just announced over 600 redundancies. It would be helpful if we could look briefly at what has happened to this factory. It raises a number of very worrying national issues.

The royal ordnance factories were given the impression by the Government before they were privatised that the relationship that existed between them and the Ministry of Defence would be continued. The royal ordnance factory Radway Green, which is in the small arms division but which produces large amounts of ammunition, worked very hard to replace the ammunition stores of the British Army after the Falklands war. Last year it worked extremely hard, including much overtime, which resulted in a considerable amount of stress on its staff, to replace those ammunition stocks. However, it has become very clear in the last few months that the Ministry of Defence has moved away from its previous relationship with the royal ordnance factories in more senses than one.

Three years ago, hardly any orders for bullets or rounds of ammunition were placed outside Britain. However, since then there has been a radical change. Last year very large orders were placed with a number of foreign companies. Doubtless the Ministry of Defence would say that this is because NATO has standardised its ammunition and that value for money can be demonstrated by making purchases abroad. The difficulty about that argument is that the orders have been placed almost entirely—in four out of five cases—with nationalised ammunition factories. For example, orders have been placed with factories in Belgium and Norway which are owned by the Governments of those countries.

When I asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he was convinced about the accuracy of the price for ammunition I was told that it was a very difficult question and that it was one for the individual companies to decide because they are very much concerned with their own internal pricing mechanism.

We are now facing a very dangerous situation. Radway Green is an example of what is happening throughout the royal ordnance factories. For the last two months it has had no orders for ammunition on its order books. The Ministry of Defence ceased negotiations with Radway Green about its new demands for the coming season, with the result that immediately there were 600 redundancies. Unless there is a rapid improvement, Radway Green may face increasing problems. The Ministry of Defence has placed orders in Norway and Belgium and with a private company in Germany that has direct connections with the Flick empire.

When I questioned the Secretary of State about the political thinking behind this policy, he said that this would happen only if British factories were incapable of supplying the ammunition. He also said that the national interest would always be taken into consideration before orders were placed abroad. However, it is clear from the dates on which the orders were signed that this did not apply to the ammunition that was bought from foreign countries.

It will be very dangerous if the royal ordnance factories are being deprived of orders by the Ministry of Defence for political reasons—perhaps to drive down the price before they come on to the market, in order to ensure that when they are sold there will be ready buyers, because they contain a great deal of expensive and efficient machinery that has been paid for by the taxpayer. On a previous occasion the United Kingdom allowed its munitions factories to be run down disastrously while other countries, often using City of London money, financed their burgeoning munitions factories. The result was a world war which Britain had to fight very hard to win.

I want the Secretary of State to come to the House and make it clear that when he says that he will not regard the royal ordnance factories as commercial units he is sincere. If the deals that he does with the royal ordnance factories are not sufficient to keep the factories viable, Britain will soon be incapable of supplying her own conventional arms needs. Those who do not believe in nuclear weapons have a strong responsibility to make it clear that we believe in the provision of conventional arms to protect this country.

It is ironic that this Government, who refer frequently to their commitment to defence, are apparently prepared to destroy the efficient royal ordnance factories without having any very clear idea of why they are doing so. Hon. Members know that the Leader of the House is a very responsible person and a very honest politician. This is not simply a party political matter. It relates to the provision of proper means of defence for the United Kingdom. If the royal ordnance factories are allowed to go into disuse, or are allowed to become incapable of supplying the British forces with the ammunition that they need, the only conclusion that we shall be able to draw is that the much vaunted patriotism of this Government ends when the quick sale of any asset is involved. That is the danger which we face.

In the future I do not want to come to the House to ask how we will create a system of royal ordnance factories to supply conventional arms to the British forces because so much of the ammunition is made abroad and we no longer control the market or have any efficient or viable way of maintaining our own factories. That is the danger. If the Secretary of State is not aware of it, he should be. He should answer to the House for his present behaviour.

8.30 pm

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): I am sure the House will listen carefully to the serious matters concerning the royal ordnance factories which were mentioned by the right hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). I hope that the Ministry of Defence will give her a full reply.

I do not think the House should adjourn for the Easter recess until it has had an opportunity to debate the appointment of a Committee of both Houses to consider ways of celebrating the tercentenary of the 1688 revolution. I think few people would deny that the revolution which turned James II off the throne and brought in William of Orange and subsequent political changes, including the Bill of Rights, are historical events of first-rate importance which should be suitably commemorated.

No doubt the Committee will raise all kinds of suggestions to celebrate the event. I would suggest that a banquet of both Houses should be held in Westminster Hall. That has not occurred since the coronation of George IV and it would be a much more jolly event than a series of rather ponderous speeches. It is important that we should, from time to time, remember the great events of our history and refresh ourselves from our roots. I shall return to this point later in my speech.

It is important that we should commemorate the events of 1688 in a calm and dispassionate way. We do not want a Whig interpretation of those events, as outlined in Macaulay's history. For a Tory there is a good deal to be sad about what happened in 1688. The legitimate royal line was overthrown in favour of a Dutchman, even though his Stuart wife ruled in name equally with him. A number of the great magnates of the country turned traitor to their king. John Churchill, who later became the Duke of Marlborough, was in charge of the king's army to fight William but then went over to William's side.

On the other hand, we should remember some of the bishops of the Church of England who emerged with great credit, as they refused to swear an oath to William, having sworn an oath of allegiance to James. They were called the non-jurors and they have an honoured place in Anglican history. The main trouble about James II was his fanatical attraction to Roman Catholicism. That led him into all his errors. The rebellion was not, in any sense, the introduction of democracy into these islands.

Indeed, after 1688, the government became more and more of an oligarchy and the power of the Crown to intervene if necessary to protect the poor, as Strafford and Laud had done, was permanently crippled. Disraeli was fond of referring to this aspect of the rebellion. Nevertheless, the rebellion brought to an end the struggle for power between king and Parliament. The monarch remained the chief executive until 1714 when the Hanoverians came here but could not speak English.

Fortunately, the Church of England did not suffer. Although William was a Calvinist, Mary was a keen and devout Anglican, as was her sister, Queen Anne. Even at the time of George II, the Prime Minister, Walpole, was careful not to upset the Tory squires and clergy with regard to the Church by his policy of quieta non movere. Loosely translated, that means, let sleeping dogs lie.

It is important that we should remember these things. The constitution as it developed from 1688, with all its imperfections, and with its basis in the rights of property, was the foundation for Burke's attack, a century later, on the principles of the French revolution, which was based on the absurd notion of abstract rights. Since Burke's time, democracy has been fully developed in our constitution, although whether it has improved the quality of either this House or the other place is a moot point.

It is most important that we should remember that this country has a long and glorious history. We should nurture that and it should inspire us in all that we try to do here. This magnificent building, put up at the height of our power and influence in the 19th century, reminds us of our great past. It is important that we should never forget that past. We are not a new nation, as Germany and Italy are, but an old one. Our long history no doubt gives us that tolerance and poise which foreigners notice as the hallmark of our political stability. To listen to some people talk one would imagine that the political life of the country started only with the Beveridge report or with the Labour Government of 1945. We go back rather longer than that.

The idea of constitutional monarchy has developed in a marvellous way. All executive acts are done in the sovereign's name, but always with a Minister responsible to Parliament. The Queen also represents everybody from the highest to the lowest. That is a powerful force in the cohesion of the nation.

The hereditary peers have also survived, and long may they do so. They represent splendour, ceremony, tradition and, of course, independence. I only wish that in this House we had more representation of the landed interest. We need more squires and fewer lawyers, accountants, bankers, and book-keepers.

[Mr. John Stokes]

What a fortunate nation we are. We should be ever thankful for our constitution. We often need reminding of the pleasure that it brings to us. The celebrations will be extremely valuable. I am sure the Committee will do a good job. I am not in the least put off by the fact that a Pym is chairman, as the earlier Pym is, I gather, only a collateral ancestor. I am sure the present Pym is as good a royalist as any of us here.

The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) will have to curb his affection for the Levellers and the Diggers but I am sure that he will also contribute a great deal because of his love of English history. I wish the Committee well and if it wants any help or guidance I am always ready to oblige.

8.38 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I am sure the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr Stokes) will accept my apologies for not following him in his line of thought. I am sure the House found his speech an entertaining interlude.

I support the pleas of the hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) that something should be done about crossbows and it should be done quickly. I support my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on the question of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 and Crown immunity. I also support my right hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) in his plea for some justice for speech therapists.

There are two matters on which I wish to address the Leader of the House. First, during the recess, the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education will announce the closure or proposal to close about 9,000 places in polytechnics and colleges of higher education. I believe that that will cause great consternation. People like myself believe that the Government should not be contemplating reducing places at higher education, that they should be expanding the places in higher education and that there ought to be an early opportunity for this House to debate these proposals.

I am also certain that hon. Members on both sides of the House will wish to make strong pleas about particular courses which are under attack. Therefore, I plead with the Leader of the House, if we cannot have a shorter recess to allow for a debate about the proposals to close places in higher education equivalent to the closure of one substantial polytechnic, to arrange either a statement or a debate as soon as we return after the Easter recess. Many hon. Members will wish to press the principle that there should be no closures, and even more hon. Members, especially Tory Members, will wish to plead that an institution in their constituency or their area should not close.

Some proposals have already leaked out and started to cause consternation. At Wolverhampton polytechnic, there is talk of closing the whole of the engineering course. My hon. Friends the Members for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) and for Wolverhampton South-East (Mr. Edwards) are making strong representations about that. Some people argue that, as the Government have closed so many engineering firms in the midlands, it is logical to close places on courses. However, the whole House will hope that we can rebuild the engineering industry of the west midlands and other areas, and that in the next 20 years we shall need more rather than fewer engineers. I hope that that proposal will be hotly debated, and that the Government can soon announce that it will not go through.

There are proposals to close fine arts courses, which, again, have been serving the nation well recently. It would not be fair to list all the places that are at present threatened, because the proposals will be announced on 4 April, and some of the rumours may be inaccurate. When we return on Tuesday, we shall have education questions, following which I hope that there may be a statement from the Secretary of State for Education and Science about the NAB proposals, so that individual Members can make representations about the principle and particular closures that affect their constituencies.

If the Leader of the House does not make that opportunity available, the Government will probably be pressed for a series of Adjournment debates, and through other procedures of the House. Therefore, it would be for the good order of the House if the Leader of the House could find an opportunity for an early statement on those NAB closures, and a chance for hon. Members to express their complete opposition to the loss of 9,000 places in higher education in 1987-88.

The second topic that I wish to raise relates to a firm in the Stockport area. It is in the constituency of the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Arnold), who shares my concern. He was certainly spending a great deal of time yesterday and today trying to talk to the people involved to ensure that the jobs are not lost from his constituency.

As the people who work at Cableform Electrical Engineering of Romiley come from the whole of the Stockport area, I am sure that the Leader of the House will appreciate my concern about the matter. It is particularly alarming that this seems to be another example of financial manipulation, which has nothing to do with the genuine efforts of either the local management or work force. Cableform has been a successful firm in recent years. It has a good profit record, and good employee relations and, until last week, any hon. Member would have been pleased to have the firm in his constituency. Certainly, the people of Stockport were pleased that it offered such good job opportunities.

It appears that the parent company, Contech, got into financial difficulties because of its activities connected with technology in the North sea, and decided to put Cableform up for sale. Last week, assurances were given that a series of bidders would be considered, including a management buy-out bid. It was understood that the bids had to be in by yesterday. People are alarmed and upset because on Friday Contech announced that Fisher Karpark Electrical Engineers from Sowerby Bridge had concluded a preliminary deal, without the other bids being considered, and that a contract of sale to that company would be signed tomorrow. Not only would the sale go ahead without the consideration of the other bids, but it would result in the loss of all the jobs at Romiley, the closure of the factory and the transfer of the work to Sowerby Bridge.

I appreciate that the people in Sowerby Bridge would like to have those jobs, but I am sure that the Leader of the House will appreciate the considerable concern of the people in Stockport that, as a result of financial dealings, a successful company can be plucked from Stockport and moved elsewhere. Certainly all the hon. Members for the Stockport area are extremely alarmed at that proposal going ahead, especially in view of the fact that the directors of Contech seem to have neglected their duties under the Companies Acts at least to take employees into account. Indeed, some would argue that they have failed to take into account even shareholders' genuine interests in quickly concluding a deal with Fisher Karpark Ltd. without waiting, as they had originally intended, to consider alternative bids.

I hope that the Leader of the House can give us assurances that the Department of Trade and Industry will look carefully at the matter, to see whether the Companies Acts have been observed. I hope that the Department of Employment will consider the implications of the sale, since I understand that notices of redundancy have been issued, and there should now be 90 days of discussion. It appears that those 90 days will be a complete farce because I am assured that in the agreement between Contech and Fisher Karpark it is proposed that, once the factory is empty of work, it could be sold back to Contech for some other activity.

I am sure that the Leader of the House will wish to consider the matter carefully. I assure him that the hon. Member for Hazel Grove and I are anxious to meet the management of Fisher Karpark and Contech to ensure that the jobs remain in Stockport, and that the people who have been working efficiently and loyally for the company are not thrown onto the scrap heap and the work transferred elsewhere.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): I hope that the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) will forgive me if I do not comment on or follow what he said. He will appreciate that he has been making some constituency points, and I intend to do likewise.

I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House because I am aware that this is the third occasion on which I have raised a particular constituency matter—that is, the NIREX proposal to site a nuclear waste dump in my constituency. You will recall that I had the opportunity to speak to the House during the Consolidated Fund debate, when I made it clear that my constituents are implacably opposed to the proposal. They are opposed on three grounds, and I shall summarise them briefly, because I have elaborated on them previously.

First, we do not believe that it is right, proper, safe or appropriate to dispose of intermediate-level nuclear waste, albeit of the short-life type, in a near-surface disposal facility. Secondly, we do not believe that the geological and hydrological properties to be found at Fulbeck make the site appropriate. Thirdly, we believe that the road network will make the safe transport of the material impossible.

I have made those points before and I should like to emphasise them tonight. I know that a similar approach is adopted by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) who shares my views on this matter. I should not be in the least surprised if my hon. Friend sought to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to make his observations.

Since I had the opportunity of speaking about this matter during the Consolidated Fund debate, two particular points have arisen which require some consideration. The first is financial loss. It is important to realise that my constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes are suffering real financial loss. When a person seeks to sell a property he may find that, as a direct result of the NIREX announcement, he is unable to sell that property at all or at its full price. My constituents and those of my hon. Friend are therefore suffering substantial financial loss. Society has no policy to deal with that loss, as NIREX is not under a statutory duty to compensate, and there is no other authority to which my constituents can go.

My constituents are suffering financial loss through no fault of their own, and the House must, as a matter of urgency, discuss what can be done to help people suffering in these circumstances. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes and I are corresponding with the chairman of NIREX in an attempt to agree upon compensation schemes. I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that that is an inadequate approach, and we will in due time be pressing for a proper compensation scheme, if necessary backed by the authority of the House.

My other point is a more narrow one. The spokesman for NIREX has made it clear that the road transport communications for Fulbeck are inadequate and that, unless a great deal of public money is spent on upgrading those roads, there is no possibility of NIREX using Fulbeck. My constituents and I are extremely angry to learn that intense anxiety, concern and fear have been caused, when it now seems that the road transport system is inadequate even in the view of NIREX. I wonder whether NIREX is behaving in a responsible fashion. The hostility to these proposals in Lincolnshire is intense, it spans all parties, and it is implacable, and I hope that it succeeds in defeating the proposals.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will be able to help me on one or two matters. As he will know, about three weeks ago the Select Committee on the Environment published a report on the disposal of nuclear waste. There were a number of conclusions in that report, some of which do not directly touch on the matter that I am raising. Some, however, do.

First, the Select Committee reports that there is no urgency for a new facility. We know that the low-level material can continue to be disposed of at Drigg at least until the turn of the century, and probably beyond, especially if the modern technologies of incineration and compaction are more widely used. Moreover, the intermediate-level waste can continue to be stored where it is—on the stations and plants which produce it. There is, therefore no urgency.

Secondly, and perhaps most important, the Select Committee states in terms that a near-surface disposal facility—or if I may call it this, a dump—is not an appropriate way of disposing of intermediate-level waste, whether short-lived or long-lived. Yet NIREX is proposing to dispose of intermediate level waste in such a facility. NIREX is going in the face of the recommendations of the Select Committee report in the central feature of its policy.

The Select Committee makes it clear that the nuclear industry has not pursued a policy of sustained research into methods of disposing of these classes of material. That is one of the most serious criticisms of the industry that I have yet heard in a responsible publication.

We all know, and the Select Committee revealed, that there are other viable alternative methods of disposing of such material, notably in deep geological sites on land or in the sea bed. I should like my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to help me at this point. On any view of the matter, the Select Committee has produced a report which contains conclusions which require and demand a detailed considered response. It seems to all of us concerned to be wrong that we should contemplate the possibility of having to debate the special development order before we have had an opportunity to debate the Select Committee's findings.

I would put it more strongly than that. This country, my constituents and the House will not understand how we can properly debate the special development order until the Select Committee report has been considered in detail by the Government, the Department and the nuclear industry, or before the House has considered, not just the report but the Government's and the industry's response to it. We could not justify such a course of action to our constituents. How can I tell my constituents that we are right to debate a special development order before we have considered the Select Committee's report? That is not possible, it would not be right, and my constituents would be right not to accept that.

It is imperative to a proper discussion of these special developments orders—should we reach that stage; on other occasions I shall seek to persuade my right hon. Friend not to reach that point—that we leave ample time to debate the Select Committee report in the context of a full and reasoned response by the Government, Departments and the nuclear industry. That is the request that I make to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House tonight.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Deus ex machina, the Leader of the House should go to the Ministry of Defence tomorrow morning, judging by the number of contributions pertaining to that Department. If he is the senior Cabinet Minister in the pecking order, he should summon the Secretary of State for Defence to his room.

The first defence issue can be dealt with rapidly, because it was covered by my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley). Like him, I have been in contact with Mr. and Mrs. Mills. The tragic death of their son in possibly negligent circumstances in the Falklands makes revision of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 imperative. I leave it at that, because my right hon. Friend put the case eloquently.

On a second topic, I make no apology for returning to the case of Mr. Clarence Robinson, which I raised after 1 am in the debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill, and to the strategic defence initiative research.

First, what is the Government's view of the activities of Clarence Robinson, whose visit to Britain at the beginning of March was discussed on the Floor of the House, and especially of his attempt to suggest that his stay here was sponsored by British Aerospace? Secondly, what do the Government think in the light of Clarence Robinson's apparent duplicity in using the hospitality of British Aerospace to suggest that this lent him the necessary credibility to visit other firms, such as GEC-Marconi, to discuss classified research work which had already been denied to him? Those are not the actions of a simple innocent tourist. Mr. Clarence Robinson has a relationship with the Pentagon and the Government of the United States.

Thirdly, was Mr. George Gallagher-Daggitt, as the director with responsibility for university and research councils in the SDI organisation, correct in stating that academics taking part in the SDI innovative science and technology programme would retain the freedom to publish their research and that the opening exchange of scientific views would continue? Alternatively, was the spokesman for the United States embassy correct in describing the classification process, based on military critical review technology, as one which would deny freedom to publish research and would preclude the free and open exchange of scientific ideas? Both could not be right. Either the United States embassy or the senior official attached to both the Ministry of Defence and to the Department of Education and Science, presumably speaking for the British Government, was correct.

How much money can British academics hope to obtain from the United States SDIO's innovative science technology programme? Is it a little, as stated by George Gallagher-Daggitt, or is it a lot, as our leading universities appear to imagine?

Fourthly, does the deal between Westland Helicopters and United Technologies allow for the world-leading technology of Westland's research into composite materials to be permanently removed from the United Kingdom for the sole use of United Technologies to further its aspirations to secure SDI research contracts with that same technology?

Fifthly, were the Prime Minister and the Government informed and has approval been given for discussion of the detailed and classified items from the memorandum of understanding by the strategic defence initiative organisation meeting in Washington today on Tuesday 25 March? Was permission sought from the Secretary of State for Defence by the Government or by the United States to discuss the contents of the memorandum of understanding at that seminar in Washington today?

Sixthly, what practical reason can the Secretary of State for Defence now provide for not publishing the memorandum of understanding and for not allowing a full and proper debate on the commercial, legal and diplomatic issues which it raises, now that the SDIO has taken a unilateral decision to discuss the contents of that agreement and what purports to be a private meeting with British companies in Washington—the terms under the export of goods control order and extra-territoriality?

Seventhly, will the Secretary of State for Defence eventually tell the House what are the specific arrangements outlined in the memorandum of understanding which cover the following issues, all of which I understand are being discussed in Washington at the meeting today: first, the security procedure; secondly, the administration of contracts; thirdly, the limitations of the memorandum of understanding; fourthly, the right for Anglo-American partners within the SDI programme to attend conferences together; fifthly, the arrangements which must be made for face-to-face meetings; sixthly, any other administrative procedures with a bearing on security or on the classification of research and development work; seventhly, the intellectual property rights; eighthly, the national and international trade laws; ninthly, the requirement for Government guarantees to underwrite SDI research; and, tenthly, any penalty clauses attendant on the award of SDI research contracts.

Eighthly, will the Secretary of State for Defence say whether he has taken any action, and what was that action, to quell the fears of the British research community that participation in SDI will in the near future have detrimental effects on the free access to scientific research and collaboration in development, free trade in high technology products and the freedom of individuals to discuss scientific and technical ideas?

Ninthly, does the Ministry of Defence have any plans to publish parts of the memorandum of understanding in the form of a commercial guide for British firms participating in SDI?

I have been very precise and very detailed. I do not apologise to the House at all, because this is a matter of gargantuan importance. I am glad that the Leader of the House is nodding in agreement, because, whatever may be the differences between the Government and their critics, of whom I am one, I do not think that either of us would in any way underestimate the vast importance of what is loosely called star wars, although I prefer to stick to technical terms.

I wish to raise another matter which I first raised in the form of a parliamentary question on 18 December 1985. I asked the Secretary of State for Defence

"what financial payment his Department is making to Mr. Jim Smith following disclosures by him to the Department which led to £400,000 excess profits being recovered by the Department in respect of defence contracts placed with his then employer; and if he will make a statement."—[Official Report, 18 December 1985; Vol. 89, c. 215.]

To save time, I shall not go over the detailed answers.

The issue here is: what are the Government's obligations to what are loosely called whistle blowers? I refer to a number of press cuttings to establish the view that this is not an esoteric interest. On 16 December 1985 Mr. Richard Norton-Taylor, writing in The Guardian, said:

"The principle that whistle-blowers should be compensated is recognised in some cases by the Inland Revenue, which can reward people for information about companies or other individuals."

Mr. Stephen Bates, writing in the Daily Telegraph two days before Christmas, on 23 December, said of Mr. Jim Smith:

"The Ministry praised him for his 'public spirited co-operation' in its post-costing operation with Aish, which has repaid £421,000 but has refused to consider compensating Mr. Smith for the loss of his job. He is on the dole and is having to sell his house in Camford Cliffs, Dorset."

On 30 November, an article in The Economist, under the heading

"Thanks ever so, Mr. Smith", ended by saying:

"The Ministry's policy is not likely to win over many other prospective whistle blowers. If it wants people to risk their jobs to safeguard the public purse it had better stand ready to compensate those who lose thereby with something more than hot air."

Again in The Guardian, on 21 December, it was reported that Sir Gordon Downey, the Comptroller and Auditor General—as a former member of the Public Accounts Committee, I always take Comptrollers and Auditors General seriously—told the Committee:

"Mr. Smith's allegations clearly had a significant impact on the volume and effectiveness of the MoD's post-costing activity with this firm."

The basic story is that Jim Smith tried to stop Aish bluntly ripping off the Ministry of Defence by subtle accounting methods introduced to the company by a new executive. Jim Smith was sacked in the middle of a board meeting when he refused to agree to what looked like being a fiddle of accounts. The next day he passed to the Ministry of Defence all the information about what he saw as a racket. He sued for unfair dismissal and lost in a nasty case of miscarriage of justice. The tribunal made it clear that it found against him because there was no evidence, so it said, of excess profits. But at the same time the Ministry of Defence accountants, who had been helped by Jim Smith, had exposed huge excess profits. Later, £400,000 was paid back by the company and it agreed not to charge another £350,000 which it had originally asked for. Now, almost every week more slabs of money are being paid back to the taxpayer.

Meanwhile, Jim Smith, who brought the situation about, found his business collapsing. He worked as a consultant in a close-knit circle of people who understand defence accounting. One by one, for their own reasons, they started to desert him. Work from the Ministry and from the defence industry around the Ministry dried up. Almost at once he found himself without an income. He had been used to a high income and had a big mortgage which he could not pay. Now he faces eviction and all sorts of illness and family problems.

I come to a matter which should, I think, concern colleagues of all parties. I am informed that the Treasury has said that it would consider a recommendation for compensation if it came from the Ministry of Defence. No one knows better than the Leader of the House how careful the Treasury can be. Will he find out from the Treasury —I shall put down a parliamentary question to establish it—whether my information is correct and precisely the terms in which the Treasury has said, or has been alleged to say, to the Ministry of Defence that it would consider a recommendation for compensation?

I understand that the Ministry of Defence absolutely refuses to pay a penny. It now claims that Jim Smith did not tell it at once about the excess profits and is producing all sorts of things—the worst is lies—from Ministry officials to substantiate its claim. I put against that what is in public print from the Comptroller and Auditor General, Sir Gordon Downey. Why should the Ministry be so uncharitable to a man who has saved it £1 million or more and in the process has exposed the way in which other contractors may well be fiddling their profits?

Will the Leader of the House tackle the Secretary of State for Defence about the actions in this matter of his Ministry's arms sales directorate and the way it has worked on the key contracts committee of the Defence Manufacturers Association? On that association, was there any director of Aish? Bluntly, could it be that the arms sales directorate is in some way protecting its friends and an industry which would be heavily exposed if people like Jim Smith were encouraged to come forward? While Smith is in the mire, others like him might be discouraged and malpractices would go on.

I recollect that in 1974 Alan Grimshaw came to Parliament to tell us about malpractice in the National Coal Board, then under the chairmanship of Lord Robens. His information was certainly used to save the board about £7 million, but the coal board sacked Grimshaw and he died a few years later in poverty and bitterness. He was a decent man and the way he was treated was a disgrace to Parliament. Parliament owes something to Jim Smith and to those who are prepared to stand up for the public interest.

Mr. Paul Foot writes:

"Jim Smith is a brilliant and honest accountant. He helped to save the taxpayer three quarters of a million pounds by telling the truth about the company he worked for. He's been rewarded with an offer of supplementary benefit, and is being forced to sell his house."

In The Mirror of 6 February the story was repeated.

I must tell the Leader of the House that I have been rather careful about this matter. In making a speech of this kind one does not simply rely on one, two or even three sources of information. I have been worried about the matter for some time, ever since before Christmas, when I started putting questions. It raises a broader question about the way in which civil servants and those who work for the public service and are concerned with the public interest are treated by this House.

This is neither the time nor the place to go into all the lessons of the trial at the Old Bailey 13 months ago of Clive Ponting. One of the lessons I learned from it is that there should be some board outside the Civil Service to which those who are either in the Civil Service or have relations in it can go. One step would be to make the head of the Civil Service rather different from the Cabinet Secretary, because the juxtaposition of those two jobs is deeply unsatisfactory.

In the absence of a really independent head of the Home Civil Service there ought to be some board organisation —all right, consisting of retired mandarins or people who know—to which someone in difficulty, like Jim Smith or Clive Ponting, could go to explain his side of the story. The Labour party is now committed to such a board or organisation. I want to know tonight and in the coming weeks whether the Leader of the House thinks that the House of Commons has given proper treatment to Jim Smith in the light of the service that he performed for this nation.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): I listened riveted to the story of Jim Smith told by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). It is slightly within my knowledge, because I am a member of the Public Accounts Committee. I wish him well in his pursuit of the case.

I want to raise another matter which, like that raised by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), arises in a neighbouring constituency but which is now of major concern to all the members of the local authority, in my case in Manchester, not Stockport. The matter has now become one of national concern. I refer to the situation at the Poundswick school in Manchester.

Let me refresh the memory of the House. Hon. Members will simply know of this matter as the graffiti case. The trouble with this case, like so many, is that it hit the headlines and then disappeared. Such cases are a matter of interest for a few moments. People take a glancing interest, make a few speeches, have a demonstration and then the matter goes away. But the people who are affected have to go on and bear the burden. In this case that burden is still being borne to this day.

I wish to bring the matter to the attention of the House before we rise because it is rather urgent and Easter is crucial in the story. The story began on 18 June last year when there was some grossly obscene graffiti, so obscene that it has never been published and is simply passed around from hand to hand, that made remarks about members of staff and their families. It was carefully planned, some of it being written backwards so that it would be seen through the windows outside, and most of it was of enormous size.

Five pupils admitted to the headmaster that they were responsible. The governors of the school investigated the matter and agreed with the headmaster that the pupils should be sent away. The local authority overturned that decision. As a result of the local authority's decision, teachers refused to teach the five pupils. That was the beginning of a long-running dispute.

It is impossible to describe to the House the effect that that has had on the school. The school has been totally ruined. The boys concerned were in the fifth year and the latest data that I have, which are from March, show that the number of pupils attending in the fifth year is 6 per cent. of the total. But the effect goes throughout the school. Fifteen per cent. of the fourth year are attending; 36 per cent. or one third, of the third year; 58 per cent. of the second year; and only 71 per cent. of the first year. It can be seen that the effect of the dispute has ricocheted throughout the school and has had a devastating effect.

Alas, there is more to it than that. The local authority caused this trouble. I make no bones about saying that there is a strong political element in it. Leaving that on one side, it made its position known and that was the bed that it had to lie on. For a long time, the battle raged and the unions refused to allow the teachers to teach. At the end of last year an agreement was reached with the National Union of Teachers and one of the other unions that the teachers would go back. The condition on which they were to go back was that they would not have to teach the five boys.

That sounds wonderful, until it is realised that the five boys were sitting in the classroom with a number of other children. The local authority was signing an agreement with its own teachers saying that the pupils in their care were no longer, by remit of the local authority, to be taught by their own teachers. In other words, because the five boys were going to turn up—nine councillors turned up at the gates to make sure that they did turn up—the other pupils in the classes were not to be taught. That, by any standards—I am delighted to see that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) has joined us—is disgraceful.

I urge the House to consider where we go from here. I put down a question to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science, which he answered on Monday, asking him to intervene or to do something to put the matter right. His reply, which I half expected, was that it is a local authority matter and he cannot intervene. I would question that, and the matter is now extremely urgent. I would question it because a local authority has the duty to provide education for the pupils in its area.

Of course, we all know that if there is a normal dispute certain circumstances will arise. But this is not a normal industrial dispute. It is a situation in which the local authority itself has put its hand to an agreement by which it deliberately excludes certain of its pupils from proper teaching.

A number of suggestions have been made: that the boys should be taught elsewhere; that special private tuition should be given to them. Obstinately, they refuse to consider them. They say that they wish to go to the school and to hell with the other pupils who are left outside. They say that the other union, which is the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers, which has refused to go along with this agreement, should go along with it. If it did, the net effect would be that 177 of Manchester's pupils in the fifth year would not be receiving full-time education, by a ruling of their own local authority.

This is a matter of grave concern not only to Manchester, but to the whole of the education service. The Secretary of State has a duty to ensure that the local authority does not operate in this manner. It is particularly urgent and particularly sad because, as my hon. Friend will recognise, the fifth year is the most crucial for many schoolchildren. They will be taking their examinations this year.

Two things happen between now and the examination period. One is that, on 23 May, it is usual for fifth formers to leave school. That is quite normal, but they have the right to stay on until the end of July. So far, the local authority has refused to make any statement as to whether it will enforce the 23 May date. The effect will be that those teachers who are now out will not be able to take part in the planning for next year, so that the effects of this dispute will go on not only through the current academic year but into next year as well.

More important — I urge my hon. Friend, if he possibly can, to use his good offices to solve this problem — if those children in the fifth year, despite all the problems that they have had and all the efforts at studying at home and in other ways, turn up for those examinations and one of the five boys appears in the same room, all the teachers invigilating — not only members of the NAS/UWT, but all of them—will leave and the examinations for all those pupils will not take place.

There has to be a way of solving that, if nothing else, and I urge my right hon. Friend, before we rise for Easter, to have a word with his right hon. Friend so that something is done about it.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) will forgive me if I do not follow his remarks, but of course the issue that he has raised is one that has hit the national headlines and we are all deeply concerned, like him, that there should be a solution to that very difficult problem.

I want, to follow the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), because he and I, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Wakeham) have had a bombshell dropped upon our constituents in the form of the announcement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on 25 February that we were to be the subject of a special development order to be laid before the House after the Easter recess which would foreshadow the possibility of our four constituencies being subjected to test drilling with a view to finding out whether one of them would be suitable for the dumping of nuclear waste.

In the case of my own constituency, the bombshell was dropped somewhat earlier than 25 February, because I found out in May last year that it was the intention of NIREX to recommend to the Secretary of State that my constituency should be included in that list.

I was not idle between last May and 25 February last year. I made several attempts to find out from my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department of the Environment whether the rumour that we had heard last May was true, but they refused to confirm or deny that rumour. The rumour became fact. I have to say that when I hear rumours about possible action to be taken by the Government or Government agencies in my constituency that is likely adversely to affect it, whereas in the past I was prepared to dismiss such rumours as idle speculation, I shall err on the side of believing them.

The argument against South Killingholme being chosen as a nuclear dump is similar to the argument aganst the use of Fulbeck, Colchester, South and Maldon and Mid-Bedfordshire. All those sites have good reasons for not being a nuclear dump. They all have special characteristics. I know three of the sites well for the simple reason, as I have said before, that when I make my weekly return journey from my house to this House, I pass through the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and within a mile of the village of Fulbeck. I am usually on side roads and going slowly, and I take the point that my hon. Friend made about the roads in his constituency. I drive through the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire, and he is right to draw attention to the density of population there.

I draw the attention of Ministers in the Department of Environment to the fact that South Killingholme has two oil refineries, is already housing, below ground, some several thousand gallons of liquid petroleum gas and is a village alongside the Humber bank that has more than its fair share of hazardous industries. I know that it could be said by Department of the Environment Ministers and NIREX—not publicly but privately—that as the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes has a constituency that is already a rubbish dump for the dangerous and hazardous materials produced in it, and he has already had the misfortune to represent, in his former constituency, the village of Flixborough, he can jolly well put up with the naming of the site.

The naming of South Killingholme as a site was based not on any reasons of geology or logic, but on one fact. The Central Electricity Generating Board happens to own a piece of dead land in my constituency for which it has no other use. It happens to be, by coincidence, a major shareholder in NIREX. It intimated to NIREX that it had no other use for the land, and that it would make a good rubbish dump for nuclear waste.

Rehearsing constituency points is for another occasion, but I wish to concentrate the attention of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House on the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham, that since the statement of 25 February there have been developments in the House with the publication of the report of the Select Committee on the Environment. My right hon. Friend shares a concern and responsibility for the Select Committee system. My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham said that it would not be understood in our four constituencies how it could be possible, at the end of April, for a special development order to be laid before the House, before the conclusions of the report have been considered by Ministers, NIREX, hon. Members and our constituents. It would make a mockery of the whole Select Committee procedure. It is a major report, very highly regarded on both sides of the House and chaired by an hon. Member who is well regarded by everybody. When he puts his name to a report of this kind it carries a certain honour and integrity.

[Mr. Michael Brown]

Therefore, it is not simply a Select Committee report attacking the Government for party political purposes, to be tossed on one side; it is a report that concerns every hon. Member because the constituency of every hon. Member could have been a target. I am sure that every hon. Member, if the chips were down, would not be able to recommend to his constituents the dumping of nuclear waste in his constituency.

The Select Committee report cuts across all party lines and brings to the House and the country certain very important conclusions. I want to draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to some of the conclusions in the report, specifically paragraph 280, where the report states:

"We therefore recommend that site selection criteria should be established in advance and published for each type of waste disposal route likely to be developed. Thereafter, the Department of the Environment should ensure that any possible future disposal sites identified by NIREX should satisfy the site selection criteria for that disposal option. Thus responsibility for final 'short-listing' of possible future sites should effectively rest with the Department of the Environment rather than NIREX".

My argument with my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department of the Environment is that they constantly tell me that the selection of my constituency was nothing to do with them and that it was a matter for NIREX. However, the Select Committee report states that it is the Department of the Environment which should take the responsibility for site selection.

I think that it would be wholly reprehensible for our Select Committee system if we were to have a special development order laid before the House which flies in the face of the evidence and recommendations made in the Select Committee report.

I ask my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to respond not to passion—although we can adduce, and have adduced, passion — but to the cold logic put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and supported by myself. The case against a special development order for our four constituencies is arguable and we shall argue against it. However, the case against laying the special development order before the House before Ministers have had time to consider the report and their response to it is unanswerable.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) will experience, as I once did, the tremendous relief of learning that NIREX is no longer interested in his constituency. I say that not only because of my concern for his constituents—although if not his constituents, inevitably somebody else's, would suffer—but because my hon. Friend has made such a signal contribution to our debates on many subjects and it would be a real tragedy to lose him, for however brief a time.

I seek to stop the rising of the House before a commitment by the Government — either before the Easter recess, or we may be able to delay it until the recess on 5 May — to more flexible licensing hours and a commitment to action in the next Session of Parliament. The present law was designed to meet social and economic conditions during the first world war and shortly afterwards. That was in the days of the horse and cart: a time of war, when work patterns were quite different from those of today. Public attitudes and desires were then very different, but we are now in the 1980s.

As time is short, I shall make two brief but important points in explaining why the time for change has come. First, there is now too much unemployment. More flexible licensing hours would lead to the creation of more jobs in, for example, the brewing industry, restaurants, public houses and hotels, and in the tourist industry generally. After all, if we had more reasonable licensing laws—foreigners and many of us see them as unreasonable—many more people would be attracted to this country. We do not need to gaze into any crystal balls, because we actually liberated the Scots in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. That Act introduced wide flexibility. It is interesting to note that as a result, one in three public houses has taken on extra staff, and 1,500 more people have been employed.

If the same pattern was followed in England and Wales, we could be reasonably sure that at least 15,000 new jobs would be created, together with a further 5,000 new jobs in restaurants. There would be increased capital investment, which would lead, in turn, to more equipment and services. As a result, more people would be employed in producing those services. In Scotland, the services have improved through, and since, that legislation. More food is provided in Scottish public houses and other tourist spots. There are better amenities too. Such facilities would provide, of course, more work in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Secondly, more flexible licensing hours would reduce drunkenness, and therefore crime. The figures published by the Scottish Office and the Home Office in 1984 show that, in Scotland, offences of drunkenness fell by 41 per cent. during the past five years for all age groups, compared with a fall of only 9 per cent. in England and Wales. For the younger age groups, the under-21s, where the greatest problem exists, offences of drunkenness in Scotland were down by 49 per cent.—almost a half—while in England they fell by only 12 per cent. Of course, that is not solely due to licensing changes. Many other factors were involved, including the slight depression in the economy in that part of the world, which cannot be gainsaid.

However, it is clear that, since the Licensing (Scotland) Act and the abolition of strict licensing controls in Scotland, there has been no deterioration in that great country's moral fibre, and no increase in crime. That is why many chief constables now support the view that flexible licensing hours would help to reduce public order problems. For a Government who are so concerned about public order and respect for the law, that must be a very telling point.

I will not delay the House, which is anxious for the next business, with my formula for reform. However, the Brewers' Society has proposed a very reasonable formula which retains complete control by the licensing justices, as everyone of good sense would wish. I call only for a commitment in principle. A commitment would be popular not just with brewers, licensees, managers, the British Tourist Authority and the English tourist board but with the people in this country. It would be in line wth the recommendation made by the Erroll committee 14 years ago. It would be in accord with modern social requirements. It would provide jobs and reduce crime. It would be consistent with the Conservative party's principle of restoring freedom with responsibility where we can. Because of all this, it would find support in the whole House.

In the past, a very small number of hon. Members resisted such changes because they believed that any relaxation in the law would lead us into the arms of the demon drink himself. Governments have not had the courage to face up to that minority, and the law has not been changed. Now, at last, we have a Government full of conservative principles, good sense and courage. I call for a commitment that will put cheer into the glasses of most of us in this country this Easter adjournment, and especially of those who will be drinking cheerfully in the public houses and the businesses of Burton on Trent—the brewing centre of England.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I thank the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) for the punctual conclusion to his speech. He spoke with a consuming and, I suspect, a consumer's passion. He seems to see flexible licensing rules as a social panacea. It seems that there is no problem facing this country that would not be resolved at a stroke and I am sure, therefore, that suggestion was noted with great interest by the Leader of the House. However, being of a mildly cynical disposition I am forced to note that we in the House already enjoy that privilege. The trouble is that I am not sure that our example convinces any of the doubters, inside or outside the House.

The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) spoke with an understandable passion that would have been shared by any hon. Member who found himself confronted by what the hon. Gentleman rightly described as the bombshell that he and his hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) and others had to face in the recent announcement. The easy energy source of the nuclear world is another panacea, but there is a tendency to overlook the inconvenient fact that the resulting waste is slightly different from coal ash or the residue from oil-burning. The hon. Member for Grantham outlined the problem of housing blight. Although a real problem, it is, sadly, probably one of the least of the problems besetting all our constituents.

Most hon. Members probably share the hon. Gentleman feelings, because we could all be in the same position. The hon. Gentleman made the point that it would be an abuse of logic for us to debate the special development order before debating the report of the Select Committee and hearing the Government's response to that report. I hope that the Leader of the House will feel able to accept that clear and overwhelming case.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), with his innate capability for asking searching questions—I doubt whether there is any other hon. Member who researches his speeches in more detail than does he—referred to Mr. Jim Smith. He made sure of his facts. He not only checked his facts; he double-checked and treble-checked as many sources as possible. If I understood the reactions of hon. Members, there was a general feeling in the House that he has drawn attention yet again to a case where there has been real abuse.

When somebody has saved the Ministry of Defence between £420,000 and £1 million, it is something of an ingratitude for the Ministry to sit back and let the man lose his job. He is on the dole and he has been forced to sell his house, but the Ministry refuses to offer any compensation to him, despite the fact that the Comptroller and Auditor General appears to have substantiated my hon. Friend's points. This is a positive deterrent to similar disclosures and therefore to similar savings of public money in the future. The whole House ought to want to ensure that this matter is properly investigated.

My hon. Friend also asked questions about past and present events relating to the strategic defence initiative. I have little doubt that in the time that is available to him the Leader of the House will ensure that all my hon. Friend's questions are fully and adequately answered.

My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) referred, rightly, to the fact that, when all our competitors realise the importance of education and training in this age of high technology, we are, unbelievably, cutting back on the resources that we are willing to devote to education and training. The Confederation of British Industry and industry generally are pleading with the Government and saying that there is a desperate shortage of skills, but in 1987-88 the Government intend to reduce the number of places in higher education by 9,000. They are also abandoning the Robbins principle.

The hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Stokes) who was in his place a moment ago but who has now left the Chamber, although he is normally punctilious about being in the House for wind-up speeches, referred to the establishment of a Committee for the tercentenary celebrations of the events of 1688. I noted that his adulation of the hereditary peerage savoured of the defence of illegitimate legitimacy. That marked his analysis of the development of the great families of this country.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), who apologises for the fact that he is unable to be here at this stage, raised an important point which had considerable support on all sides of the House—the fact that service men cannot sue for negligence. Most hon. Members will have had experience of cases of this kind. My right hon. Friend asked me to make it clear to the House that he was not referring to negligence during wartime. In many of his speeches, including the speech on his early-day motion, he made it clear that he was referring to non-combatant duties. He understands the difficulties that would arise in wartime. However, he rightly ridiculed the pathetic arguments that have been raised by the Ministry of Defence against the abolition of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) is aware of the very deep and genuine anxieties, on both sides of the House, about the future of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill. Would it not be quite wrong for us to approve this motion before hearing from the Leader of the House about the Government's intentions as to that Bill? My right hon. Friend appreciates that I did not hear most of the speech of the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) on a matter that directly concerns me. As my right hon. Friend appreciates, I have been frequently in touch with the Secretary of State on the matter about which I have also tabled parliamentary questions. I saw the deputation from

[Mr. Alfred Morris]

Poundswick when they came to Parliament, but I understand that no Minister from the Department of Education and Science was able to do so.

Mr. Williams: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). On the last point, it is normal courtesy in the House to notify an hon. Member if an issue is raised which relates to his constituency. That is obviously a matter for my right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Withington. That courtesy is normally extended by hon. Members to one another and I am sure it was an inadvertent oversight on the part of the hon. Member for Withington.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe raised the question of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill. There is grave disquiet in the country about the Government's intentions, especially among those organisations which represent disabled people. The Leader of the House should accept that we should see it as unacceptable for the Government not to announce what their intentions are at this stage in relation to the legislation. It is legislation which all those organisations which are involved with disabled people and those who have disabled people in their families, recognise as timely, humane and much needed.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) presented a case, with substantial evidence to support it, of the persecution of 35,000 Nepalese Christians. The House would always condemn intolerance, inhumanity and untruths of the type described, as we would condemn them anywhere they occur. The House looks with particular affection to Nepal because of the debt of gratitude that we have always felt and owed to the Gurkhas for the support they have given us in many campaigns for many years. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Mossley Hill for giving us the opportunity to learn about this case.

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) touched on an infuriating situation — the inadequacy of disciplinary procedures within all the professions, but in this particular case in relation to the medical profession. He pinpointed the General Medical Council's limited powers of discipline. He pointed to the need for wider powers and for intermediary powers and sanctions to deal with a wider range of cases than can be dealt with at present. I share his sense of the preposterous with regard to the arguments that were advanced by the GMC against the private Member's Bill which is coming forward. The Council's argument was nonsense and the hon. Gentleman has done a service in focusing attention on it.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) opened the debate and dealt with the case of speech therapists. I am sure most Members have received representations on this issue and most of us recognise the dedication and ability of this specialist group within the National Health Service. We feel it is appalling that they are rewarded so inadequately for their critical and demanding work.

I am not sure whether I want this particular term to end. It has been a rather entertaining couple of weeks. The Government started back from Christmas still in the pantomime mood. Even in the weeks before we started back, they were leaking letters left, right and centre. We had the entertaining back-stabbing camaraderie of the Cabinet room. We had resignations, protestations and denials. We had "hunt the letter" and all manner of amusing, entertaining festive games, here on the Floor of the House.

In keeping with this atmosphere of buffoonery we had the behaviour of the Secretary of State for Transport. He is always good at joining in a situation of that sort and he gives value in that context. Therefore, understandably, he also popped up halfway through the period to be found guilty in the courts on a third occasion of abusing the laws and imposing illegal tolls on those of us who must use the Severn bridge.

To ensure that no Government foot remained uninjured, we have had several weeks of the British Leyland saga — the Government's attempt to sell to the very American companies which since 1978 have contributed to nearly all the extra import penetration that our car industry has faced——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Motion for the Adjournment (Easter and Monday 5th May) and the Lords Amendments to the Local Government Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Malone.]

Adjournment (Easter and May Day)

Question again proposed.

Mr. Williams: I am sorry. I thought that I might have talked the debate out. [Interruption.] It is one of the few occasions on which a Whip has given me good advice. It may be symptomatic that it is not a Labour Whip.

We have had an entertaining period, which makes me recognise with some regret that we are about to go down for holidays. Nevertheless, I live in hope. One shining opportunity was raised by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham). He raised hopes that these glorious, delightful moments that we have all shared in the weeks since Christmas will be revived when we come to the Shops Bill. He asked the Government what concessions they would make because it would be a matter of great difficulty for them. That makes me savour the prospect of a renewal of internal Government hostilities on the other side of our recess.

10.1 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I should like to thank the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) for reminding us how the modest difficulties concerning Westland are already so far behind us that we could almost be in another Parliament, let alone in another year. All the other difficulties will be put in a wholly revealing context as the economy proceeds, the success of Fulham are consolidated in the local authority elections, and the Labour party consoles itself with the new great ideological inquests that it must have as, once again, Socialism is rejected by the country. However, it is not the purpose of this mini debate on the most innocuous resolution that we should take a few days off at Easter to engage in that sort of contentious politics. Rather, it is my privilege to respond briefly, but comprehensively, to the questions raised.

I shall start with the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin), who explained the reasons for his absence. In all quarters of the House there will be great sympathy with the cause of speech therapists. I understand that they have now presented a claim which is with the management side, and there we must leave the matter. However, I assure him that I shall raise the matter with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) drew general support for his anxiety about the effective working of the powers of the General Medical Council, and I shall report his views. Meanwhile, I am certain that he and many other hon. Members will be sympathetic to the efforts of the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) with his private Member's Bill. My hon. Friend can judge its prospective fortunes when he examines the Order Paper.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) asked for a strategy for agriculture. I am certain that he is absolutely right in saying that the movement from a position of relative balance in food supplies and consumption to one which seems to be of endemic surplus in most major commodities calls for the most serious reconsideration of the strategy on which agricultural support is to proceed. I have also noted my hon. Friend's concern about the closure of Ministry of Defence establishments in his constituency. I will see that his anxieties have my reinforcement. I also notice that he hopes, in respect of the Shops Bill, for an open mind from the Government. Of course, my hon. Friend is asking for something that is perfectly obvious and it is not necessary for me to underline that.

The right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) raised an issue that is familiar to the House, thanks to his persistent advocacy. I will of course do as he requested and forward the report of this debate to the Secretary of State for Defence.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) spoke about the problems of gipsies. Although we talk about human rights in other countries, I wonder how we would relish the United Nations telling us how gipsy encampments should be dealt with in this country. However, I will leave that matter to one side. That is not a jocular point but one of very real substance and I will of course do as requested by my hon. Friend.

The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) is much concerned about the closure of the company in his constituency. I take note of what he says and of his belief that the companies legislation has been ignored. That is very serious, if it should be so demonstrated, and I am certain that my hon. Friend will be putting his evidence prima facie to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I will report to my right hon. Friend the points that have been made.

My hon. Friends the Members for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) and for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) argued with great force their feelings about the NIREX proposals and I understand their procedural point about the relationship between the special development order and the Select Committee report. I will take a sympathetic view of that and I may be in touch with my hon. Friends in due course.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), with no constituency interest, I am sure, but out of concern for the wider national good, argued for more flexible drinking laws. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and I both gave answers on that topic within the past 10 days or so. Although my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton lives in hope, as indeed everyone does, of the Government changing heart, I do not think that I can change that quickly.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) hopes that the Government can avoid pilotage legislation. I have a vested interest in any arrangement which can do just as well what is proposed through legislation and which takes the place of legislation. I will therefore look with utmost interest and sympathy at whatever my hon. Friend has to say further on that matter.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) argued about the AOR fleet replacement vessel — with great fluency and with, I thought, the most commendable ideological elasticity. I have never heard a Labour Member argue the case for a free enterprise concern confronted by subsidised competition from a collectivist competitor. However, the hon. Gentleman speaks for the entire north-east, irrespective of party affiliation and I will pass on his remarks.

I would like to return to the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North about the growing use of crossbows. I have the utmost sympathy with my hon. Friend's point and I will gladly refer to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary the possibility of introducing a system of licensing. I have no doubt that that is a subject which could feature in private Members' legislation in the next Session of Parliament.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) argued with great persuasiveness, although I am not in any position to comment on the virtue of her argument. Everyone in the House, however, will be concerned about our national procurement policy, and the importance of national sources, not to be exclusive, but to have the dominant role in that situation. As requested, I will pass on the hon. Lady's comments to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. Indeed, I think that next time my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence might be at the Dispatch Box answering this debate rather than myself as he seemed to feature more prominently in the general requests than I did.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Stokes) talked about the tercentenary celebrations that are planned, and I will ensure that his views are passed on to the organising committee. I was delighted that he gave a first-class historical survey. Hon. Members should realise that those were the very events on which we have based our traditions and allegiance. He also mercifully suggested a banquet, which added a certain lift to the whole subject.

I liked the reference by my hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge to the bishops. Was it not wonderful that, in those days, seven bishops were prepared to stand apart from the modus, convention and commitment to the fashions of the day and, were prepared, on a point of principle, to become the noncomformists, or the non-jurors? I wanted to say that about bishops.

The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish again raised the serious subject of places in higher education. I shall, of course, draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

[Mr. John Biffen]

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) demonstrated a most formidable case on the strategic defence initiative. I could not even begin to answer a fraction of his points. I hope, therefore, that he will excuse me if I merely say that, whatever our views about defence policy, is it not important to consider the fact that the defence system may become so important and dominant that the policy serves the defence system but really the defence system should serve the policy? I welcome the hon. Gentleman's interest in this topic. I hope that he will remain the good, sound, radical, irritating Member of Parliament he has been these 20-odd years. Those attributes have given him a place of special affection, at least in my eyes, in the House.

I shall look at the points made by the hon. Member for Linlithgow about Jim Smith and shall get in touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. I understand the analogy the hon. Gentleman drew with the pit prop case in the 1960s and 1970s.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the right hon. Gentleman raise Jim Smith's case with the Treasury?.

Mr. Biffen: Yes, certainly.

I do not want to become involved in an internal dispute about Manchester, but the case to which my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr Silvester) drew attention—the so-called graffiti case—is not the property of Manchester; it belongs to a much wider national debate. I therefore see no reason why the House should not have the opportunity to take a view on those matters. I shall pass on my hon. Friend's remarks to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) referred to the treatment of Nepalese Christians. Of course, a country with a strong tradition of association with the Gurkhas would take a keen interest in Nepal as a friendly neighbouring country and would wish to exercise friendship and tolerance in its appreciation of that country's social customs. I shall refer my hon. Friend's points to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. I am sure that my hon. Friend would be the first to realise the strict limits to which one can push the question of the influence which can be successfully harnessed to the spirit of friendship. Beyond those limits, it becomes an irksome and ineffectual attempt to interfere in the social arrangements of other countries.

The important point of this evening's debate is the motion. Without it, we could not have this short break. We work longer hours than any other Parliament in western Europe, and I think that we earn and deserve the break.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House, at its rising on Thursday 27th March, do adjourn until Tuesday 8th April and, at its rising on Friday 2nd May, do adjourn until Tuesday 6th May; and the House shall not adjourn on Thursday 27th March until Mr. Speaker shall have reported the Royal Assent to any Acts which have been agreed upon by both Houses.

Local Government Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 2

PROHIBITION OF POLITICAL PUBLICITY

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, line 16, leave out ", or can reasonably be regarded as likely to affect,".

The Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government (Mr. William Waldegrave): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 2 and 3.

Mr. Waldegrave: I do not have much enthusiasm or pleasure in moving the motion. The amendments remove the concept of publicity material and publicity campaigns which "can reasonably be . . . likely to affect"

public support for a party.

10.15 pm

The Government's view on this has been made quite clear throughout the debates in the House, in Committee and in another place. We believe that the removal of these words seriously weakens clause 2.

As the House will recall, prior to these amendments the prohibition of party political publicity fell into two parts. Local authorities were to be prohibited from publishing material which appears to be designed to affect public support for a political party and from publishing material which on a reasonable view — the Clapham omnibus test, if you like—would be regarded as likely to affect such public support.

The second limb of the test supplemented the first. One of the most disquieting developments that we have seen in recent years is the effort and resources which some councils are intent on devoting to the production of campaigning and publicity material which, while it may not apparently be designed to promote a political party, would nevertheless be so taken by any reasonable person.

The second leg of the prohibition in clause 2(1) tackled this problem. It follows therefore that the amendments made to clauses 2 and 4 of the Bill in another place are not acceptable to the Government.

However, the Government believe it essential for the Bill to receive the Royal Assent before 1 April to ensure both the enactment of the date for a rate provision for the next financial year and, given the limited time available before the Easter recess, to ensure that there is no question of unintentionally making some of the Bill's provisions retrospective.

For these reasons, we do not propose to invite the House to disagree with the Lords amendments to clause 2. The position, as my hon. Friends will be quick to point out, is far from satisfactory. It is true that the Bill as amended is a much needed improvement on the present position where there is no express prohibition on party political publicity. For this reason, the Government have decided that further legislation should be introduced next session to restore the effects of the Lords amendments to clause 2. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment announced this recently.

Amendment No. 2 deals with a much smaller issue, the removal of the word "particular". This again we regret. It was a common-sensical definition which seemed to make sense, but I am not going to ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to reverse the Lords amendment. We will have to return to this in the autumn. I have to urge my hon. Friends, although I know that this is not palatable to them —and I can tell them it is not palatable to me either—to accept half a loaf in order to get something on the statute book, and in due course we will have to return to the matter.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I have a submission from the National Union of Journalists, Forth valley branch, saying that it is concerned about the proposed Local Government Bill which is currently progressing through Parliament. It says:

"We feel that the Bill could seriously affect information being given to the press by local authorities. We would therefore offer our support to any moves against the Bill which you may be considering."

That is signed by Tim Harper, secretary of the Forth valley journalists.

For the sake of time, I put it in question form. Do local papers have anything to fear in their relations with local authorities in the gaining of information? It may make it easier if the Minister were to interrupt.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am delighted to do so. I believe that I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks. No newspaper has anything to fear from this matter. I believe that the worries—I understand them because this is a sensitive area in which to be legislating—are ill-founded.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I rise with some regret because I was looking forward to seeing the Bill go forward unamended. I believed very much in the spirit of the Bill and that we were going to cane those Labour authorities which were wasting ratepayers' money throughout the country. I had hoped very much that the Bill would do that.

It depressed me when I read yesterday's Leicester Mercury dated 24 march, which said:

"Thank you. The Local Government Bill, which gags Local Councils freedom of speech is likely to become law. However, Leicester City Council and Leicester people have played an important part in securing major amendments. We would like to thank those in Leicester who joined the Council's campaign to defend local democracy — Voluntary groups, residents associations and all members of the public who wrote or phoned us to express their support.",

It had the audacity to say:

"Leicester City Council . . . trying to work for you."

Ratepayers living in Leicester have to pay for that propaganda promoting the Labour party. I object to that. I had hoped that the Bill would stop people from printing party political propaganda on the rates. I understand the position in which my hon. Friend the Minister finds himself. Because he has to get the Bill through by 1 April, because the House of Lords is not sitting much longer and because it is difficult to get their Lordships all into the right Lobby more than four times a year, we are faced with material which, if it is designed carefully, will be published on the rates to persuade people in Leicester to support the Labour party. The amendment is a severe letdown to my constituents.

[Mr. Peter Bruinvels]

On 19 June 1985 the Labour party in Leicester introduced a political unit whose purpose was basically to monitor the way in which Conservative Members of Parliament reacted in the city. It was also to allow £137,000 to be spent on stopping Leicester from being rate capped. But Leicester was rate capped, so our money was wasted. The political unit was to increase "public awareness of the need for the City Council to regain powers such as control of education and social services lost to it in the 1974 local government reorganisation."

Why should we have to pay to have such propaganda shoved up our noses? I object to it. I object, too, to the equality unit which the city council established which at a cost of £20,000 per annum tells people why it is good to have the Labour party running the local authority. The council set up a racial awareness course costing £37,000 initially and £28,000 per annum. What has that to do with the city of Leicester? The council established creche facilities at £41,900, a trade union officer at £10,000 a year, an anti rate-capping unit at £150,000, a contract compliance unit to ensure that contracts had nothing to do with the South African Government and a public relations unit which was supposed to work for us but which works instead for people who do not pay rates. Those who fund the rates and who put money into the city do not have a voice, whereas those who do not pay have.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Has my hon. Friend made any calculation of either the number of additional houses which could have been built or the number of young people who could have been trained if all that money had not been wasted by the local authority in the way that he described but had been spent in socially helpful and useful ways?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman goes down that road he will be out of order. He must stick strictly to the amendments before the House.

Mr. Bruinvels: The essence of my hon. Friend's intervention is that the council was wasting ratepayers' money on promoting the Labour party rather than helping the people who live in the city and who have to pick up the tab at the end of the year. Many houses could have been repaired with those exorbitant, wasted funds, yet the council deliberately chose to keep 12,000 houses throughout the county unoccupied so that it could claim there was a housing crisis in the city of Leicester. That was a dereliction of duty. The city council was elected to give value for money. It was not a Conservative council, so I suppose it did not try to give value for money, because it was spending money that did not belong to it.

Only last week, for instance, the Trades Unions Congress women's conference came to Leicester. Instead of the local authority charging the TUC £1,250 for hosting the conference, it gave the facilities free because it was its Labour party friends from London who were coming to Leicester. If any other organisation, including the ex-service men of Leicester, had tried to hire the De Montfort Hall, it would have had to pay. Why is the city council using such propaganda? Why are the Government doing away with the appropriate clause in the Bill? If some people in Leicester have a different view from that expressed by the city council, why should it not be promoted?

The council is wasting money, with the latest edition of Leicester Link, promoting Labour party propaganda and spending about £3,000 on promoting what the Labour group on Leicester council feels about Nelson Mandela. Why should the ratepayers, the citizens of Leicester, have to pay £3,000 to be told what the city council reads and feels about the struggle——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is making a Second Reading speech on the principles of the Bill. I invite him to direct his attention to the narrow provisions of the amendment and to speak to that.

Mr. Bruinvels: The narrow part is that political propaganda on the rates is to be allowed, and I object to that. We are trying to get that clause reinserted in the Bill. I and a number of my hon. Friends feel let down by the fact that political propaganda is to be allowed to continue.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): The hon. Gentleman may have newspapers coloured red. I have here the Ratepayer Reporter for Westminster, and it is coloured blue. It is full of writings by Lady Porter and has pictures of the Secretary of State for the Environment. There are two sides to this argument.

Mr. Bruinvels: It does not matter which party puts out the propaganda, it should not be allowed, and I object to paying for it. Wherever it happens, the residents are right to call in the district auditor to look at the way in which propaganda is put out. That is why we need this clause and do not need to have the Lords amendment thrust upon us, because we cannot get a large number of their Lordships together in another place to sort out this amendment. That is a tragedy for citizens, who rightly feel abused.

When I listened to the Minister of State and the Secretary of State for the Environment, I believed that we could hope to save money for the citizens of Leicester and for the citizens in other local authorities. I thought that the Minister had made himself clear when the Bill was introduced that we were to stop this kind of propaganda on the rates. In Leicester this year the rates bill has gone up by 80 per cent. That is killing jobs and denying businesses the opportunity to expand. The Labour party says, "We are doing this to help you." Who is it helping? Business is at a trickle, a number of people have no chance of promotion and we are in a nasty situation. It is a rates blow, and I am worried about that.

Leicester city council spent £20,000 telling me and other residents that it was working for us. That seems quite incredible and out of line with what we want to see—proper control of our rates. It is propaganda. We pay the bill, but it appears from what my hon. Friend has said that we will have no say. I am bitterly disappointed. Propaganda is rife in Leicester. My constituency is talked about and I am warned on the back of the Leicester Link of February 1986 about what will happen if an international airport at Evington is allowed. There is also advertising in the national papers. That is a scare tactic by the Labour council, but we have to pick up the bill. Any expense of this sort is totally irresponsible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying from the amendment. If he does not stick closely to the words of the amendment and what it means, he will have to resume his seat.

Mr. Bruinvels: We on the Government side are trying to stop propaganda from being put on the rates.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must direct himself to the Lords amendment that has been tabled.

Mr. Bruinvels: It reads:

"or can reasonably be regarded as likely to affect,"

We are talking about the Bill and about propaganda. I want to address the matter of the £150,000 that is being spent campaigning against rate capping. In that campaign the Labour party says, "We are working for you." The Labour party spent that money after the council was rate capped, and that was a disastrous dereliction of duty by the city council. Having spent £150,000 to try to stop the council from being rate capped, even though the citizens of Leicester were crying out to be rate capped, it was not possible — despite the amendments that I want to see inserted—for the council to be rate capped.

10.30 pm

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): The amendment changes the test so that it will be possible for local authorities to indulge in political propaganda which, while not promoting a party, may have that effect on the electorate.

Mr. Bruinvels: Exactly, and that is why last Sunday in the city of Leicester there took place a ceremony at which the Welford road recreation ground was renamed Nelson Mandela park. Throughout the area the Labour party had on display stickers promoting the change, and we must pick up the bill, amounting to £13,650—more waste of the citizens' rates.

It is clear that all the campaigns — be they on behalf of gays, CND, the prevention of terrorism or —[Interruption.] against the police, will be allowed, and that is a tragedy for my constituents. Similarly, the city council is trying to establish a twinning arrangement with Nicaragua, claiming that the Labour party there has strong international links with the city council. Why should we citizens have to pay £7,000——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I warn the hon. Gentleman that I shall have to ask him to resume his seat unless he relates his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Bruinvels: The amendment weakens the Bill, and that worries me.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are not discussing the Bill. The hon. Gentleman had better resume his seat. Mr. Benyon.

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) is wrong in thinking that the amendment removes clause 2 in its entirety. It simply ensures that the provision corresponds more closely to the recommendations of the Widdicombe inquiry. It is essential in these matters to proceed slowly and with consensus, or we will get it wrong.

The Lords are simply asking us to try this out and see what happens, and we should take their advice. I believe, from my experience in local government, that clause 3, which the Lords have left untouched, is the important provision.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would you please explain to me what is going on?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I warned the hon. Gentleman several times, after which I directed him to resume his seat.

Mr. Benyon: I urge hon. Members to agree with the Lords in this proposal.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): My hon. Friend referred to his experience in local government. Did he serve on an authority on which militant Left-wing councillors were spending ratepayers' money trying to unseat Conservative Members of Parliament?

Mr. Benyon: I live in the area of a very Left-wing Labour authority. Through my letter box comes the sort of material to which my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East referred. The amended clause will prevent that material from appearing in that way. But if I am wrong, there will be an opportunity to change the measure. To go against the recommendations of the Widdicombe inquiry would be counter-productive in the present situation. We must proceed slowly, and if what is proposed turns out to be wrong, we can then have another go at it, as the Minister explained.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): I support the objective of the Bill in preventing local authorities from abusing the system by indulging in political propaganda on the rates.

I should like the Minister to explain, when he replies to what I hope will be a brief debate, why he accepts the Lords amendment with reluctance. I represent, as hon. Members will know, a town that specialises in the holiday trade. The local authority has expressed great concern about the original wording of the clause. My hon. Friend will know that it was true historically that local authorities specialising in tourism have done much to support the infrastructure of tourism. They have built swimming pools, sea defences and other physical manifestations of the tourist trade. Local authorities have also supported tourism in their areas—I believe this is true throughout the United Kingdom — by publicity for the tourist attractions of their towns.

This aspect of the Bill has caused anxiety to the Blackpool council and, as my hon. Friend will know, much more widely among the local authority associations. They have taken the view that the original clause went too wide and was in danger of limiting their ability to publicise the tourist attractions of a town.

Perhaps my hon. Friend will explain on winding-up, why he believes that this concern, which is widely shared by the holiday towns, is misplaced. That is the inference of what he says. Does he think it necessary to restore the clause later in this Session? Can he give an assurance that, if it is done, local authorities specialising in tourism will not be handicapped in publicising their attractions?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): I doubt whether anyone would question my credentials concerning my experience and knowledge of Left-wing councils.

My hon. Friend is in a very difficult position in having in his Bill, which has come back to us from another place, words placed in by former permanent civil servants, who are, there, usually out of touch with reality. We have to be in touch with reality. Although my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon) said that he wished to proceed by consensus, I can think of nothing worse than consensus. It is usually the lowest common denominator.

I have listened carefully to what was said by the Minister. He gave one of the clearest undertakings I have heard at this stage of a parliamentary Session that we will, rather than may, have to return to this matter in the next Session with a further Bill. I understand this issue well. I have been under attack in my constituency for a long time, from this sort of political rubbish. Those hon. Members on both sides of the House who have served in local government know that neither major political party would have indulged in it six years ago, let alone 10 or 20 years ago. We are faced with it now.

We must rely on two things. First, we must rely on a clearly growing anxiety among responsible people in all three major political parties. Although it may be said that publication of various muck sheets may be of assistance to the Labour party, I doubt whether the Labour party wants to see this sort of publication, which is gradually displacing moderate councillors by militant councillors. I do not believe that the Labour party wants this, although it may be too scared to say so publicly.

We need to act in a realistic and practical fashion. One would have wished to see the Widdicombe report published in full much more swiftly. "Mark 1" of Widdicombe, in the majority report. It sets out the real problem, saying that it is not yet certain how it should recommend that publication be dealt with.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins (High Peak): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend, but why is it in order for him to talk about the weakening effect of the amendment and for my hon. Friend the Minister to say that he regrets that the amendment weakens the original intention of the Bill when it is not in order for my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) to make the same point?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a matter for the Chair. The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) was really making a Second Reading speech and not applying himself to the exact terms of the amendment.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I was specifically talking about amendment No. 2, leaving out the word "particular". I could talk to all three amendments, but it is convenient to save time and talk to one. Obviously, I could speak for longer, but I shall resist the temptation.

It was the majority report of the Widdicombe committee that led to the Bill and the amendments before us. I ignore for this purpose the minority report which, frankly, was not even worth the paper that it was printed on. I am glad that no one has referred much to that.

I hope that when my hon. Friend the Minister replies he will make it clear that one of the main reasons that he adduced for not asking us to reverse the amendments was, first, the retrospection issue, and secondly, the pledge that he gave that further legislation will cover the real anxieties —I do not need to stress that—that all of us have. What is proposed tonight will not be detrimental to democracy provided that we return to it in the next Session.

I am prepared to accept what my hon. Friend the Minister has said.

10.45 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. Has not one element been left out? Should not my hon. Friend have been saying to the House that unless we agree to the amendments tonight we shall not get the Bill by 1 April? Failure to do that means that my hon. Friend the Minister cannot keep his promise to us and do what we all want this evening — to stop all the nonsense of political propaganda. Should not we soon end our speeches tonight and allow the Bill to go through so that my hon. Friend the Minister can keep his pledge and do what we all want in the next Session?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I find it difficult to agree with my hon. Friend completely. Will it suffice if I say that I too wish to see the Bill on the statute book as rapidly as possible?

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I had the pleasure of serving on the Committee which considered the Bill and, along with a number of colleagues, I spent most of my time arguing that the Bill was far too weak. It was something of an unpleasant surprise to discover that for technical reasons we are placed in a position tonight where we have to accept these ridiculous amendments from the other place which will fillet the Bill and weaken it in a dramatic manner.

It seems to me that the nub of amendment No. 1, which limits the ban on political material to material which appears to be designed to affect support for a political party, thereby excluding the wider test of material which can be regarded as likely to affect public support for a political party, neuters the Bill.

I say to those colleagues who believe that we still have a Bill which is helpful in the period until we have another, that certainly on my reading of the Bill it would allow any local authority to continue supporting the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. It will allow local councils to provide financial support for political pressure groups provided the money has not been earmarked for specifically political purposes. It will allow indirect funding of left-wing newspapers like Labour Weekly and New Socialist through advertising.

I know that hon. Gentlemen are in favour of public funds being used to help the Labour party, but those of us who believe in democracy and a free society are totally opposed to that.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not want to mislead the House. He knows very well that he can make a better argument than the one he is putting forward now. He knows very well that it is on record on many occasions that the Labour party is not in favour of using ratepayers' money to support the Labour party or any other party. What is more, exactly that phrase was used in the Labour party's official evidence to the Widdicombe committee of inquiry.

Could the hon. Gentleman explain what he means by the suggestion that it is somehow the intention of local councils indirectly to support papers like Labour Weekly and New Socialist?. That is not the purpose of those councils.

Mr. Forsyth: It seems that the Labour party's policy on this matter is rather like its policy on council housing — it says one thing in public and does another in practice.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Answer the question.

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I will endeavour to answer the question. If hon. Gentlemen are opposed to the use of public money to support political campaigns, for political purposes, why do they not vote against these Lords amendments tonight? The effect of these amendments is to allow local authorities to do that. I know that the Labour party has a problem in controlling some of its more extreme councils, which are busily using the loopholes in the law to carry out practices which I am delighted to hear the Opposition Front Bench condemning here tonight.

Mr. Barron: The hon. Gentleman has been asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) to give a specific answer. He mentioned Labour Weekly and said that local councils supported it. Could he tell us exactly how?

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Gentleman wants me to answer the question of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) he should not interrupt me in the middle of doing so. The situation with regard to Labour Weekly is this. Certain councils, such as my own, Stirling, and many others advertise consistently in Labour Weekly posts for officers; they receive no replies and they have been consistently criticised by district auditors. Colleagues are mentioning other councils — Manchester, Walsall, Sheffield. No doubt the hon. Gentleman can collect the names afterwards. I fear that I may be straying from the purpose of the amendment if I continue to list the many Labour councils that are doing this.

If the hon. Gentleman is in any doubt about the danger in these amendments and if he believes that the Lords amendments which we are being asked to consider are not dangerous, I refer him to an advertisement which appeared in Marxism Today by an organisation called "Union Communications", saying that it can be of help to local authorities. Anyone inquiring gets a letter back from one of the directors which says:

"You ask about Union Communications. Basically we are a small team of professional journalists PR and design people who have come together to offer the trade unions and Labour local authorities a communications service that beats anything the Tories can lay hands to."

"We believe we are succeeding."

"We have not worked as yet with many CLPs, though we would be happy to do so, except in so far as when we work for a local authority we invariably get involved with the CLP and help their own PR work."

"We have shown Basildon Council, for instance, how to put 10 per cent. on the Labour vote. Inevitably the CLP was involved and we had to show them what to do."

The point about this and other activities in the Labour party is that it is possible to carry on propaganda activities that can influence and improve the Labour vote without producing material that can be shown to be deliberately designed for that purpose. The amendment will weaken the test that would have caught such activities, and thereby open the floodgates to what the hon. Member for Blackburn has condemned, but which is rife within his party. Although Opposition leaders may condemn such activities, they are incapable of controlling the party. The Bill is needed in its original form to help them, and save them from their extremists.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): So far, the hon. Gentleman has concentrated all his remarks on the activities of Labour boroughs. There has already been an intervention about today's release to many hon. Members living this side of the river—a publication from the Tory-controlled City of Westminster. Does he believe that a publication that on its front page says "Rates down, services up" and inside speaks about the savings from the abolition of the GLC, which are arguable in the light of recent figures, is designed as likely to affect political support for the Conservative-run City of Westminster council? He should not criticise one party without admitting that his party is equally guilty.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but, as is always the case with his party, he wants to have it all ways. If the hon. Gentleman is concerned about material that he says could be regarded as likely to affect public support of a political party, why is the hon. Gentleman supporting the Lords amendment? It would have the affect of removing that provision from the Bill, so allowing material produced by any council, whether Tory or Labour, to be designed to affect that. I have not seen the publication, so I shall not make an instant judgment, but it is extraordinary for the hon. Member to be complaining about something that in Committee he consistently did everything in his power to prevent being included in the Bill.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: I have had the chance to study the document to which the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) referred, and I agree with the hon. Member. Is this not an illustration of the point that my hon. Friend is trying to get across? If the Labour party were allowed to get away with producing such material, the inevitable consequence would be that Conservative and alliance authorities would be forced to follow suit, and that is the dangerous thing about having such an amendment to the Bill.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It was evident in Committee that we did not approach the matter from a partisan point of view, but from a desire to have the best practice in local government, so that political parties did not use public money to their own advantage.

I have a leaflet called "Working for Local People". The hon. Member for Blackburn seems keen to have examples, and I am keen to provide them for him. The leaflet is produced by Hackney borough council and is being widely distributed in the borough six weeks before the local elections. There is nothing in here that suggests that it is deliberately promoting the Labour party. However, its timing and intent are obvious. It is intended to influence the results of the local government elections.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose——

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman will no doubt have an opportunity to make his speech against the amendments. Let me make mine.

This type of propaganda material, which has been produced by the Labour party in Hackney in order to influence the results of the local authority elections, would not be caught by the Bill as amended by the House of Lords. When the Bill left this House, it would have been caught because it would have been caught by the fact that it was likely to affect the voting intentions of the electorate.

The key issue in judging whether material is party political is its effect on the people, not the motive or intention of the publisher. The intention is quite irrelevant. I have to say to my hon. Friend the Minister that I very much regret that we are in a position tonight where we are being asked not to reject the amendments.

I understand that there is a timing problem, that the Bill as it stands is required to come into effect on 1 April and that it will not be possible to change that, because it is not within the rules of order for us to do that in the House. Why could we not have had a one clause Bill to amend the Bill itself and change the date on which it came into effect? How is it possible for there to be such rank incompetence in the Department of the Environment so that we can spend hours and hours arguing for this in Committee, use considerable effort making the case for it in our constituencies, and at the end be robbed of the impact of it? I do not blame my hon. Friends at the Department of the Environment, but I hope that some heads will be rolling in the Department because the advice that the Minister has been given is thoroughly inadequate.

One of the curiosities is that the noble Lord Elton in another place reminded the House of the procedural difficulties and of the fact that it would not be possible for there to be amendments other than those relating to Lords amendments which have been made in the House of Commons. Therefore, it is clear that Ministers were aware of the procedural difficulties, but on the technical point of amending the relevant clause that sets the date they were left badly advised. I think that that is most unfortunate.

I welcome the assurance of my hon. Friend the Minister that we will get a Bill in the next Session to put matters right. I hope that not only will the effects of the clauses be restored but that we will also see tougher action to deal with some of the abuses which would certainly have not been covered by the Bill in the first place. I also hope, as we are obviously going to have a local government jamboree Bill, that he will take the opportunity of dealing with unfair contract terms and with the problems of competitive tendering.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I should like to speak briefly and simply say that I wish that hon. Members would accept the Lords amendments. I do not think that the words which are being proposed to be left out make the slightest difference to the wording of the Bill. At the end of the day, there is a whole line of House of Lords' cases which clearly show that when the judges are asked to accept whether a matter is political they make up their minds on the particular facts on that particular occasion and these words will not make the slightest difference to that.

I do not think that anybody has fought harder than myself with regard to surcharge disqualification, political expenditure and so on but I urge the House to accept the amendments because they do not make any difference one way or another.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): That is exactly the point that I was making. We have had a lot of debate about the effect of the amendments rather than the amendments themselves. Hon. Members seem to be getting hot under the collar, but I cannot see why we should be so arrogant as to believe that people are dunderheads and cannot see through anything that local authorities may be doing, or that the effect will not show up in the ballot box.

The problem is that many Government Members are seeking to put local government in a straitjacket. They forget that local government is the result of the democratic process, and they seek to condemn it. Without the amendment, the subsection reads:

"A local authority shall not publish any material which, in whole or in part, appears to be designed to affect . . . public support for a political party."

That is a straightforward subsection that will do exactly what people say that the Bill should do. But with the addition of the words:

"or can reasonably be regarded as likely to affect,"

we enter another arena. The matter would end up in court time and time again. Who will interpret "reasonably" "regarded as likely to affect"?

Who will make the decision? Will it be the Minister? If so, the decision will be politically one-sided. Will it be the courts? The Bill will do no more than provide a livelihood for the lawyers who will discuss the matter in court. In accepting the Lords amendment we will not alter the intention that lies behind the Bill, and I see no reason why it should not be accepted.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I welcome the notice that my hon. Friend gave, in addressing the Lords amendment, that he will bring another Bill back in the autumn. As he will have guessed, my hon. Friends and I are not in agreement with the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay). Anyone who believes that the deletion of the words will have no impact on the likely outcome is not putting his mind to the analogy with the law of libel, in which it is not the apparent design behind what a man says that counts but the effect. That is regularly judged in the courts, and that could well be the case if we accept the amendment.

Mr. Simon Hughes: In a libel case, a jury decides. In this case, the decision will not be made by a jury.

Mr. Walker: I am not a lawyer, but lawyers make a living out of finding out what the problems are, what the words mean and what Parliament intended——

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend need not be unduly intimidated by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). He has Lord Denning on his side.

Mr. Walker: I was not aware of that. I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention.

I have sometimes had the opportunity to sit in courts and listen to cases that were of interest to me. One thing that has become clear to me is that lawyers do very well by picking on words, defining their meaning and asserting what was intended by Parliament when Parliament inserted the words. The spirit of the law is considered as well as the letter of the law. The spirit of the law, when the Bill left this House, was, I believe, very clear. The Lords have substantially altered the spirit of the law, and we are very concerned. There will still be evidence of propaganda material being produced by authorities of one political colour or another, but that is not what matters. What matters is that this House had determined that public money should not be used in this way. The authorities that largely exploited this activity were Labour authorities. Equally, it is true that authorities of other political colours, some of which were Conservative authorities, saw what was going on elsewhere and said, "This is unfair. That is not the way in which we expect the law to be enforced, or money to be spent, but if others are doing it and getting away with and making it work effectively to their advantage, we should be fools not to follow their example. If that is how the law stands, it is right to do so."

It is all very well for Members of the Conservative party to say that public funds should not be used for purposes of that kind when that does not happen in neighbouring councils, but Dundee district council, which is adjacent to my local authority, constantly used public funds before 1979 in ways that the Government of the day, either Conservative or Labour, did not intend.

My right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench have admitted that if these amendments are accepted the Bill will be substantially weakened. Therefore I welcome the fact that they say that they will come back to this matter. For that reason I shall not make the long speech that I had intended to make, although some of my hon. Friends still may say that I should do so. I welcome the assurance of my right hon. and hon. Friends that this will happen, and I know that it will happen.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): No amount of ministerial promises will save me one penny on my rates bill in the city of Leicester. We have arrived at a lamentable state of affairs. this should not have happened. In 1835 the Royal Commission on municipal corportations referred to the corporation of Lecester and said:

"During the election of 1826 the Corporation of Leicester expended £10,000 to secure the success of a political partisan."

From 1826 to 1986, as we are on the brink of the city council elections, the wheel has turned full circle. What progress have we made?

The Royal Commission of 1835 said:

"There prevails amongst the inhabitants of the incorporated towns a general dissatisfaction with their municipal institutions . . . a discontent under the burthens of local taxation, while revenues that ought to be applied to the public advantage are diverted from their legitimate use . . . and squandered."

That was in 1835. It is still going on now, and it will continue to go on. Please, let us do something effective about it.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): I understand the frustration on the Conservative Benches. Over the years they have become accustomed, with their huge majority, to pushing all sorts of crazy schemes through this House, so when there is a hiccup they become very frustrated. When they say that they are concerned about what they generally describe as "propaganda", what they may really be afraid of is that if responsible local authorities are not denied the opportunity to explain to their electors why the rates are at a certain level, the reasons advanced by those local authorities may register with the voters and to that extent may influence the outcome of elections.

Conservative Members of Parliament cannot have their cake and eat it. If they ask local authorities to explain why they are spending a certain amount of money, they should allow those authorities to explain the situation from their point of view. It seems that Conservative Members consider that anything that comes from a local authority, especially if it is a Labour one, must be classed a propaganda, but councils concerned, as all responsible people are, that there should not be any waste of money, whether it is in local or in national Government.

Conservative Members do not realise that in pursuing the original content of the Bill, despite what their Minister has said to them, they may well blunder into a quagmire of lawyers' expenses which will involve them in spending money in far greater quantities than the amounts about which they are complaining now.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): The House will be relieved to know that I do not intend to detain it for long. I have studied the Bill and I cannot see any references to radioactive waste, therefore, I shall be able to contain my remarks to a few minutes.

I recognise the difficulty which faces the Minister, and I appreciate the assurances he has given for the future. He still has work to do. The Minister will have heard the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) in which he suggested that the words contained in Lords amendment No. 1, which they wish to delete from the Bill, did not matter one way or the other.

In the Standing Committee, of which I was a member, the Minister went to great lengths to show that those words are important and significant. Committee colleagues and I tabled amendments because we did not think that the original Bill went far enough, but my hon. Friend the Minister reassured us. We agreed with the Bill as originally drafted before it was emasculated by the other place.

The Minister stressed that the words in the Lords amendment were important. It is important for the House to have had an assurance from the Minister that we will have the opportunity in the next Session—presumably by means of another Bill — to have the words which may be deleted put back. Thus, the effect which the Minister wished to achieve with regard to local authority wastage and political propaganda would be achieved.

"or can reasonably be regarded as likely to affect,"

There is a problem for my own local authority with regard to the Bill as it will go onto the statute book. I am afraid I do have to refer to a constituency issue. The Humberside county council, a hung county council, is opposed to the possible special development order which may be presented by the Minister to dispose of nuclear waste in the area. Presently, the county council is distributing a newspaper to all households in the county of Humberside setting out its opposition to the proposal.

If the Bill were to go through without the Lords amendment, I would be able to say to my county council that it passes the test and that no Department of the Environment Minister can accuse it of wasting ratepayers money for political purposes designed to affect a political party. I am worried that if the Lords amendment is agreed to and the Bill then receives Royal Assent the county council officials——

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): The hon. Member says that the newspaper would not be regarded as in any way affecting a political party. That might be true in Humberside, but it would not be true in parliamentary elections where there were parties for and against a matter in and outside the Chamber. The newspaper would be just as likely to affect parliamentary as well as local elections, so would then fall foul of the Bill.

11.15 pm

Mr. Brown: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, but I am dealing with the Bill as it will affect the county of Humberside in the coming weeks and months. At this moment county council advisers are wondering where they will stand regarding the campaign, which all three parties want to wage and which has the support of ratepayers who wish their rates to be used for it, as a result of the Bill reaching the statute book in the form envisaged by the other place. I regret that we are invited to agree to the deletion of those words. I had hoped that they could be used as a complete defence of the Labour-controlled council. I have made it clear that in my view the council has clearly passed the test of the Bill as it was originally drafted. I am absolutely convinced that it will pass the test even if we agree to the Lords' amendment, but its advisers are in a quandary about their advice in the light of the Lords' amendment. I deeply regret that the Government have found it necessary, for reasons that I wholly understand, to give way to the other place.

We should deliberate for a few moments on the wider constitutional issues which arise from this little incident. We are accountable to our electors, and have heard the cry from all political parties in the House down the decades, certainly throughout this century, that the other place must give way ultimately to the democratic wishes of this House. It appears that we are in grave danger — Opposition Members, in particularly, will agree — of getting ourselves into a constitutional mess, if increasingly we accept amendments from the other place which fall foul of the democratic process.

I do not need to detain the House for much longer. I regret that we have found ourselves in this position. I hope that the Government have learnt some lessons from this sorry essay, and that we can look forward to a strong Bill next year which will receive the full support of the majority of hon. Members in this House and will be well regarded in the other place.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I never thought to hear a Tory complain that the Lords were passing amendments. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) should refresh himself about the availability of measures introduced by Liberal Governments, if he feels that amendments should be overturned or Parliament dealt with.

More pertinent to the amendment, I do not follow the hon. Gentleman's key point about Humberside county council, that there is a genuine and widely felt fear that the provisions may affect local authorities in which members from all political parties and no political party wish to combine to campaign on a particular issue. It is the hon. Gentleman's contention that the campaign about nuclear waste which the council is instituting will be made more difficult to sustain under the Bill with the Lords amendment than without it. I cannot understand the force of his argument. It seems manifest from the way in which the decision was reached that it could not be claimed that the material that the council was producing was designed to affect public support for a political party. However, it could reasonably be regarded by someone else as designed to do so, and it is on that distinction that the Lords' amendment turns. The exclusion by the Lords of those words appears to make it easier for Humberside to sustain its case as it in no way sets out to support a particular political party and was fighting a campaign which all parties on the council agreed upon. Any reasonable man, like my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft), with characteristic reasonableness might conclude that it would affect support for a political party. However, if that is a test, I do not think that the council in the constituency of the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes would suffer that difficulty and he should therefore be supporting the Lords amendment.

I was amazed that Conservative Members should seek to claim as some did, that the indulgence of Conservative-controlled councils in measures which would be caught by this clause even in its amended form was some recent, sudden response to the things that we have seen Labour-controlled councils do. I was grateful to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) who revealed how far back that kind of corruption in local government goes.

I do not believe that hon. Members can reasonably claim that the Westminster city council, provoked by the imminent fear of overturn, either by the alliance or the Labour party at the next municipal elections, has produced and sent out a news sheet which many hon. Members received this morning, a copy of which I have brought into the Chamber, called the "Ratepayer Reporter". This is full of pictures not of the Lord Mayor, an independent figure, but of the political leader of the council, Lady Porter, pictured in several places with the Secretary of State cutting the red tape. The paper is full of claims that the abolition of the GLC will result in cost savings for the ratepayers in the city of Westminster.

Mr. Dickens rose——

Mr. Beith: I will not give way. That point of view is at least argued in the House, and the "Ratepayer Reporter" continues to claim such delights for the people of Westminster as the provision of a new jaccuzzi and steam bath in the Seymour leisure centre.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, because I pay high rates in Westminster and I must say that the "Ratepayer Reporter" does not compare in any way with papers put out by Labour-controlled authorities in the north-east. It is much more costly to produce, contains more political pictures and pictures of Ministers, but above all, it reports on its back page information about pets, firework displays and councillors running around in scanty clothes for charitable purposes——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must relate his remarks to the amendment. We must get back to the amendment.

Mr. Beith: The point that I want to put to the Minister is that I am satisfied, although I do not know whether he is, that this news sheet put out by the city of Westminster would fail the test with the Lords amendment included in the Bill. That is the crucial point for hon. Members to realise.

Mr. Dickens rose——

Mr. Beith: That news sheet is designed to affect public support for a political party. It does not depend for its offence against the provisions of the Bill on someone reasonably regarding it as likely to affect support for a political party. It is clearly intended to affect support for a political party. That is not a new phenomenon in the city of Westminster, as it has been producing material like this——

Mr. Dickens: Will the hon. Member give way?

Mr. Beith: No. I am trying to address an important point to the Minister. I would like the Minister to say whether he feels that the wording of the Lords amendment bringing in the rest whether a reasonable man would regard it as likely to affect support is necessary to catch the "Ratepayer Reporter" within the provisions of the Bill. I am satisfied that, with the Lords amendment, the leaflet will be a caught but it must surely bring home to the Minister the complications that he has created by the wording of the clause. He must be satisfied that the words that the Lords want to remove are not necessary in order to treat such documents as condemned by the Bill.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I have lived in Westminister for 20 years and have never before seen a paper such as the one to which the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) referred. It is the first and, I suspect, the last of its kind. The hon. Gentleman should have taken the time to read The Londoner, which was published by the GLC at £750,000 a shot——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must relate his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Greenway: The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed should have read The Londoner, which is a permitted publication and which will continue to be one if the Lords amendments are carried, and he would then have shared, my concern about the abuse of public money by the GLC.

The members of the Labour and Liberal parties are laughing behind their hands. They are holding their hands to their breasts like nuns and saying that they are whiter then white, but, at the same time, they are arguing that the Lords amendments will not change, clause 2 in the way we fear. If Labour and Liberal Members do not share that fear, why do they not vote against the Lords amendments? The argument has been put time and time again, but they still attempt to split hairs. Neither party has proved anything. They way in which Liberal and Labour Members laugh behind their hands leads me to challenge their sincerity. I do not believe that they want to do anything to stop party political propaganda on the rates. They believe that their parties have profited from it, and they want that to continue. That is why they want these amendments to be accepted.

I was glad to hear my hon. Friend the Minister say that legislation will be introduced on this subject. I ask him to take a fresh look to ensure that the amendments are dealt with properly. Will he say that again and underline it in red? My hon. Friends needs to say that repeatedly.

I do not doubt that the Lords amendments weaken clause 2 seriously. They therefore damage the Bill and weaken its basic intention — to stop party political propaganda on the rates. It is necessary to stop that propaganda, because it is an abuse of democracy of public money and of our way of life. There is no doubt that, unless that material is stopped, the position will worsen and the abuse of public money will increase. One need only look at the party political propaganda generated at public expense in recent years to see the steep increase in the amount churned out.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): My hon. Friend said that in 20 years he had seen only one copy of that newspaper. I have lived in Lambeth for one year and I receive party political literature every day.

Mr. Greenway: I made my comment as a citizen of Westminster, referring to Westminster city council. My hon. Friend is right—that is the rule in neighbouring authorities. It happens all the time. That is why I am justified in saying that, in trying to defend that propaganda, the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), for whom I have a high regard, is laughing behind his hands, metaphorically speaking.

The GLC spent something like £100 million of ratepayers' money by one device or another attempting to save itself from abolition. Would the clause as it stands with Lords amendments have prevented that from happening as the Bill was then drafted? I do not believe that it would.

I believe that it is important to dismiss the Lords amendments. In the last few weeks £5,000 of public money has been donated to Ealing CND. I believe that the Lords amendments will enable that sort of abuse to continue.

The money was given to Ealing CND to promote a campaign—totally spurious, of course—to turn Ealing into a nuclear-free zone, a fatuous idea. If that sort of donation had been repeated across the London boroughs, it would have cost London ratepayers about £160 million or £170 million, and that would be just to put just one side of the question. If money had been spent on putting both sides of the question, it would have cost London ratepayers about £500,000. My argument is that it was wrong for the GLC to give Ealing CND £5,000, and to spend £81,000 on CND activities across London, as it has in the last 12 months, and it would be equally wrong to give that sort of money to those who promote the opposing argument.

Until legislation effectively prevents that kind of gross abuse of public money, the House cannot be satisfied that it has done its democratic duty by the nation. I look to the Minister to reassure me that he meant what he said, and that a Bill will be introduced early to overcome the Lords amendments. I ask the Minister to say why this cannot be done in a one-clause Bill immediately after Easter.

Mr. Dickens: Speaking as I do from the safety of the GLC nuclear-free zone, I wish to make a few remarks before allowing other hon. Members to finish the debate.

Having listened to all the contributions, particularly those of hon. Members who have crowded into the Chamber at this late hour to take part in the debate, I think that hon. Members seem to have grasped the idea that ratepayers do not want money to be used for political propaganda. It does not matter if the local council is Conservative, Labour, alliance or controlled by other odds and sundries. The general ratepayers do not want their rates used for political propaganda, full stop.

The Bill has in it a test that has been made a little tougher by the Lords amendments. It does not satisfy us by a long chalk. If the test is too firm, a local authority may wriggle to one side of the black or white. If the test is less rigid, as we seek, we would from this moment onwards scotch spending on political propaganda.

The House of Lords has amended the Bill. We do not have legislation at the moment. If we do not pass the Bill as amended by the Lords, we shall not get a Bill on the statute book, which we all seem to want, by 1 April. The Minister has said that, in the next session of Parliament, he will bring forward a measure to restore the provision which most hon. Members want. As we have been given that assurance, surely we shall represent the ratepayers better by voting fo the Government's Bill, even if we are cross about the way in which it has come back to the House. We can hold the Minister to his pledge to amend the Bill. That is what the ratepayers want and that is why I shall support the Government tonight.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins: I shall be incredibly brief; I do not want to make a speech but merely to ask a question about a matter which affects my constituency and Derbyshire as a whole. I raised it on Second reading when my hon. Friend said that he hoped that the Bill would prevent the problem. Derbyshire county counci has been forcing all schools in my constituency to return their stationery to the county council to have it overprinted with CND slogans saying:

"Derbyshire supports nuclear free-zones."

Almost all the teachers and governors I have met, whether Labour, Conservative, SDP or Liberal, have objected to the misuse of education for party political propaganda. I was assured by the Minister and by two Secretaries of State that one of the purposes of the Bill was to stop such a practice. Can my hon. Friend tell me whether we have stopped that practice? If not, why not?

Mr. Robert B. Jones: It will not have escaped my hon. Friend's notice that his hon. Friends are very concerned and angry about two issues—the weakening of the Bill and the way in which the decision of the House has been pre-empted by incompetence by one or more of the Department's officials.

The first depends on the difference between the two wordings, whether something is "designed to affect" or whether it "can reasonably be regarded as likey to affect."

In the first case, design is much more difficult to prove. For example, if a peice of literature was put out, financed by a local authority, which said, "Vote Labour" or "Vote Conservative", clearly that would be designed to affect, and rightly would be caught by the law, as indeed it would be by other legislation already in existence.

The law would also cover a case in which it was possible to prove that there was a conspiracy by the leaders of an authority, whichever political party was involved, to influence an election by putting out over a period literature which was likely to lead to a greater number of votes for that party. Design would be much more difficult to prove. Of course, it could be proved if available to the court was literature such as the extract from the Marxist group presented earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth).

We have spent much time talking about the Westminster Reporter. That would not be caught by the legislation, because it could not be proved to be designed to affect public support. However, it could be regarded as reasonably likely to affect support, and that was the wording that the Lords tossed out. Over many years we have seen a growth of political propaganda on the rates. That is why the Widdicombe committee was set up. such propaganda started in recent times when authorities like Walsall produced a newspaper that went rond the borough and carried various political points.

The practice has escalated and needs to be dealt with, but I am not convinced that the Bill, given the way that the Lords have amended it, will catch anything unless it is absolutely blatant. I am sure that that is why my right hon. Friend and his colleagues on the Front Bench disagreed both in the other place and in the Committee with a wording that would have led to the Bill being along the lines of the Lords amendment.

What can we do about this matter? I agree with my hon. Friend the Minister. Because of the timing, he has a pistol at his head, because he needs to get the Bill through to ensure that no retrospective effect arises from the 1 April date contained in another part of the Bill. Although my noble Friend was quite clear about the possible trap when he spoke in the debate in another place, no one thought to do anything about it. That is why we are in this situation. When my hon. Friend replies to the debate, I expect him to say something about action that has been taken against those whose imcompetence has led us to this position.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The arguments advanced by some hon. Members on the Government side for not opposing the Government are twofold. First, it is said that the Minister has a technical obstacle and the Bill must be given a fair wind in order to meet a 1 April deadline. As the first speaker quite rightly said, that is irrelevant to all parts of the Bill except the rate setting part which is not governed by the amendments at all.

The Minister conceded when the Bill was before the House last time that clause 1 is, first, not binding on local authorities and, secondly, is unlikely to be the material event affecting local authorities this year. Most local authorities have already set their rates and those who have not now have the experience of the court decisions that followed the decisions of the district auditor in Lambeth and Liverpool.

I rebut the argument that the Government need to give in for technical reasons of a timetable and will not accept, simply because they do not have time to accept, the challenge issued by the Lords. If the Government do not like what the Lords want, they should say so and not pretend they are being strong while being weak. The Government say that they intend to put in another Bill to be introduced in the coming year the things that the Lords have taken out of this Bill. That is a severe breach of what the Government said they intended to do when they set up the Widdicombe committee. That committee was set up to report. If the Government had followed the interim report, they would not have found themselves in nearly as many difficulties as they have been in since.

I hope that what the Minister of State said at the beginning of the debate does not confirm the suspicions that many of us have — that the good work of the Widdicombe committee is already subject to the pre-judgment of the Department of the Environment, and that the Government do not intend to pay any heed to the conclusions of the Widdicombe committee, but will do what they intend to do with their minority support in the country and their somewhat distorted minority support in the House.

If the Government believe it wise to put on the statute book legislation like that which was originally in the Bill in this or in the next Session of Parliament, I hope they will think again. I should like to say something about part II and the clause and these amendments.

Amendments Nos. 1 and 3 which stand in the names of my hon. Friends and I were all-party amendments in the Lords. There is, clearly, a difference between publicity and publicity material which, on the one hand, appears to be designed to affect political support and which on its face manifests a certain intention and, on the other, a test which is far more subjective and which the Lords amendment seeks to remove.

While it may hve been bad enough to have gone far beyond Widdicombe, as the Government have, one hopes that the arguments will have persuaded them to agree that the objective test is preferable. The Widdicombe committee made the position clear when it said:

"We wish to avoid new controls that will be imprecise or raise major definitional problems . . . the content of the material is the best test."

The content, not the intention, the committee said.

The House should accept this series of Lords amendments—and should do so with grace—not only because they have logic in that they represent more closely the intentions of the Widdicombe committee. The Government should back down from their position of seeking to have it both ways, on the one hand pretending to fly in the face of logic and reason while, on the other, trying to gain support for a view that will temporarily let them off the hook tonight. If the Government do not change their view on this matter, they will have greater opposition next year, when politically they will be more embarrassed than Westminster city council has embarrassed them tonight.

Mr. Straw: The Conservative party has a substantial built-in majority in the other place—[Interruption.]—on paper. We are discussing these amendments tonight because the Conservative party in that House was unable to sustain its majority when the Bill in its original form was debated there.

When the Labour party proposed these amendments, support for them came from Independents, Liberals, SDP peers and from a small number of Conservatives, including Lady Faithfull. The amendments were passed in the other place mainly because Conservative peers decided to stay away because they could not stomach some of the draconian contents of the Bill.

Conservative Members in this House must remember those facts when they judge the Bill as it is proposed to be amended and when they decide whether it would be appropriate to have in the next Session of Parliament legislation designed to overturn a measure which will have gone through the due process of enactment in this Session.

I agree with the hon. Members for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) and for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) that the test which would be removed from the Bill and which would be replaced by the test would to some extent go further than the original test. If that were not the case, we should have nothing about which to argue.

"or can reasonably be regarded as likely to affect"

It would go further than Widdicombe proposed, and because of that the other place decided to remove the second test. But, as the hon. Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon) and the right hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) pointed out, even with the removal of that second test, the Bill will still be a powerful weapon against any local authority which, in the view of a ratepayer, sought to spend ratepayers' money on party political progaganda.

The Bill, as amended, will say that a local authority

"shall not publish any material which, in whole or in part, appears to be designed to affect public support for a political party."

That is an objective test. It cannot be evaded by Committee reports or by legal jiggery-pokery. The courts will apply common sense in deciding whether material appears to be designed to affect public support for a political party.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the legislation as it stands would catch the Westminster Reporter?

Mr. Straw: Yes I do. I believe that the amended measure would catch the Westminster Reporter. Nobody reading it through—I know that the hon. Gentleman has not had a chance to read it through, as we have on these Benches—certainly if he were a judge, could doubt that such material appears to be designed to affect public support for a political party. There is no other purpose in publishing material of that kind.

To reassure Government Members who worry that the Bill will end up too weak, the Opposition as well as local authority associations believe that the measure contains substantial powers against local authorities. Conservative, Liberal and Labour councils are represented on those associations. The right hon. Member for Blackpool, South, whose local authority is Conservative, spoke earlier of its concern and that of many other authorities about the legislation. There is no doubt about that.

The Bill, even as amended, will still restrict local government in many respects, far more than Government are restricted in their publicity. The test of intent, taken together with the ruling of the Divisional Court in the Lambeth and Liverpool cases, which gives great power in practice to council officers to give advice, will mean that many activities and statements of local authorities which were previously acceptable will be wholly excluded.

Some hon. Members may have read in newspapers reports of Glasgow city council being advised to exclude any reference to Government policy in its publications because that was thought to be outside the Bill.

The last thing that I shall say to the Minister—I hope that he will be given leave to reply to the debate—is that we understand, and have been given good evidence tonight if we did not understand before, the pressure on Ministers from the bovver boys on the Conservative Back Benches and from the boot boys in the Cabinet, such as the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

I hope that Ministers will not heed the siren voices from their Back Benchers and from within the Cabinet, but that they will give the legislation a chance to work. We did not write this measure, but we hope that Ministers will wait to see which side of the House is right before they return to the House with hasty legislation to overturn decisions that were made six months previously.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Earlier this evening at about 10.30 pm, you asked me to resume my seat. I seek your guidance and information about the reason why I was asked to resume my seat, especially as I was referring to problems in my own constituency in Leicester. We have heard the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) talking about Westminster city council and the publication of propaganda in his area. I do feel rather deprived, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I was trying to represent my constituents and talk about the expenditure of £370,000.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I explained to the hon. Gentleman that he was making no reference to the amendments before the House.

Mr. Bruinvels: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman wants to challenge the Chair, there are ways of doing it, but not now.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I respect your power in these matters, but if you check Hansard tomorrow you will find that my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) was——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. William Waldegrave.

Mr. Waldegrave: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply to a number of points that have been made. I am not sure whether I can do justice to some of them in the few minutes that I have.

There will be a general consensus that the least satisfactory part of tonight's debate has been the somewhat unctuous performance by some Opposition Members—the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) took the biscuit with the Westminister council publication. I have not seen that. How childish that they have managed to find one Conservative council publication which may or may not be excluded by the Bill against the mass of material from Labour councils. Is the Liberal party saying—it is just possible—that there is only one party in Britain which never puts a foot wrong. I can assure the House from my experience in Bristol that that is not so. That is a dangerous game to play.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) asked about tourism. The local authorities have the power, going right back to before 1948, to publicise tourism. There is a specific provision in section 144 of the Local Government Act 1972, so I can set his mind at rest on that.

My hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Hawkins) asked about sloganeering. I shall write to him, but it is worthwhile to draw his attention, and perhaps that of his ratepayers, to the judgment of Mr. Justice Glidewell on the fact that local authorities have the power to give information but not to sloganeer. That was what limited the power of the GLC last year.

The basic point at which we must look tonight was made clearly and powerfully by my hon. Friends the Members for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon), for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens). We have half a loaf here; something to get on the statute book. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) misunderstands the timing point. It is not mainly to do with the date for a rate provision, but rather that, if we go beyond 1 April the publicity provisions will be retrospective, and severely so.

My hon. Friends the Members for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) and for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) made powerful and well-argued speeches. They said that it would have been much better not to be in this position. I shall not shelter behind the fact that officials' heads will roll. It is the responsibility of Ministers to see that we get legislation right and we did not do so. We were then faced with considering whether the matter could be corrected.

At first we thought that there was a precedent of a one-clause Bill—the Pirates (Head Money) Repeal Bill of 1850—but unfortunately, despite its promising title, it did not provide us with a precedent. Therefore, there was a real difficulty.

My hon. Friends the Members for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) and for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), before he was unfortunately cut short, asked whether we are now clearly committed to returning to the matter in the autumn to restrengthen the Bill. It will disappoint Labour Members, but I can tell my hon. Friends that we are so committed. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a clear statement to that effect the other day.

Mr. Benyon: This is an absolutely vital point as far as the local authority associations are concerned. Is my hon. Friend saying that he will do this regardless, will not actually see what happens, how the Bill works out, before taking that decision?

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend's commitment to strengthen the clauses weakened by the Lords is clear, but obviously, when we come to the drafting, we must take into account what has happened.

I will just draw attention once more to a powerful point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West, because it is the heart of this whole matter. This really relates to the rather childish points being made from a sedentary position by hon. Gentlemen. It may well be that there are Conservative authorities tempted to go outside the conventions, and if there are I can well understand why, under pressure from Liberal and Labour authorities, they are doing so. That is the evil that we want to stop. We want to prevent our people from having to behave as badly as their people. That is the basic purpose of this Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 2 and 3 agreed to.

Clause 3

OTHER RESTRICTIONS OF EXISTING POWERS

Lords amendment: No. 4, in page 2, line 34, leave out from beginning to end of line 5 on page 3 and insert—

"(a) in subsection (1) (power to make information available) after "other authorities" insert "mentioned in subsection (1B) below" and for "as to local government matters affecting the area" substitute "relating to the functions of the authority";

(b) after that subsection insert—

"(1A) A local authority may arrange for the publication within their area of information as to the services available in the area provided by them or by other authorities mentioned in subsection (1B) below.";

(c) in subsection (2)(a) (power to publish certain information) for "on matters relating to local government" substitute "relating to the functions of the authority".

(1A) After the subsection (1A) inserted by subsection (1) above, in section 142 of the 1972 Act insert—

"(1B) The other authorities referred to above are any other local authority, the Inner London Education Authority, a joint authority established by Part IV of the Local Government Act 1985 and any authority, board or committee which discharges functions which would otherwise fall to be discharged by two or more local or other such authorities."; and in section 88 of the 1973 Act insert—

"(1B) The other authorities referred to above are any other local authority and any authority, board or committee which discharges functions which would otherwise fall to be discharged by two or more local authorities,"."

Read a Second time.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I beg to move, as an amendment to the Lords amendment, (f), in line 10, at end insert 'functions exercised'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take also the following:

Sub-amendments to Lords amendment No. 4: (g) in line 11, after 'area', insert 'exercised or'.

(i) in line 12, at end insert

'or by the other bodies mentioned in subsection (1C)'.

(j) in line 12, at end insert

'or by the other bodies mentioned in subsection (1D) below where the material relates to a local government matter affecting the area'.

(o) in line 24, after 'authorities', insert 'and any police authority'.

(q) in line 24, at end insert—

'"(1C) The other bodies referred to are statutory undertakers as defined by section 290(1) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, health authorities established by the Health Services Act 1980, The Post Office and British Telecom";'.

(s) in line 24, at end insert—

'"(1D) The other bodies referred to are government departments, other public bodies and voluntary organisations".'.

(u) in line 29, at end insert—

'"(1C) The other bodies referred to are statutory undertakers as defined by section 275 of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1972, health authorities established by the Health Services Act 1980, The Post Office and British Telecom".'.

(w) in line 29, at end insert—

'"(1D) The other bodies referred to are government departments, other public bodies and voluntary organisations".'.

Lords amendment No. 5.

Lords amendment No. 6, in page 3, line 11, after "only" insert—

"(a) for the purpose of promoting the economic development of the authority's area, where the publicity is incidental to other activities undertaken or to be undertaken by the authority for that purpose, or

(b) "

Sub-amendment (a) thereto, in line 3, leave out from 'area,' to 'or' in line 5.

Lords amendment No. 7, in page 3, line 14, at end insert

"but the following provisions of this section apply to expenditure incurred by a local authority under section 142 below on information as to the services provided by them under this section, or otherwise relating to their functions under this section, as they apply to expenditure incurred under this section."

Sub-amendment (a) thereto, in page 3, line 14, at end insert

"and it is hereby declared that this section is a function of the authority for the purposes of section 142 below".

Lords amendments Nos. 8 and 9.

12 midnight

Mr. Boyes: I want to deal very briefly with three aspects of this group of amendments.

First, the Government are unnecessarily introducing a distinction between functions and services, which sows even greater confusion in a Bill already riddled with anomalies and has been described a number of times as a lawyers' paradise. In Committee, in far too many instances, Ministers replied to questions that the point would have to be decided in court.

Secondly, I shall deal with the problems that face voluntary and charitable organisations, which play a vital role in our society, particularly in the present difficult economic conditions, which increase the number of social problems due to unemployment, poverty and deprivation. Our amendment aims to broaden section 142 and enable local authorities to make greater use of that section and depend less on section 137.

Thirdly, I shall examine and demonstrate the difficult and complicated situation in which many metropolitan local authorities will find themselves on section 137 cash, which is used mainly in those areas for job creation and job protection because they are areas of very high unemployment, because essential publicity will have to be paid for with the cash that could be used for creating additional jobs.

Finally, I shall show, as Hardy would say to Laurel, that the Government have got themselves into another fine mess by trying to limit the use of section 137.

First of all, with regard to amendments (f) and (g), the Government introduced the Lords amendment as a concession to costlier publicity. They realised that it was important for local authorities such as parish councils and town councils. I had the pleasure of being a member of one for more than 10 years and am well aware of the vital and valuable work they do in our communities. One of the important functions that they often carry out is the production, for example, of a brochure describing the services that are available, often provided by other tiers of government. But, as there have been more and more cuts on local authorities in other tiers, parish councils have frequently found themselves in the front line of campaigns against the closure of schools and hospitals and the cancelling of other proposed developments.

The Bill as drafted limits the general publicity powers in section 142 to the functions of the authority issuing the publicity. The new power contained in the Lords amendment allows publicity of the services available in the area covered by the local authority and other local government bodies. It is not clear why the Government have introduced the distinction between functions and services, and our amendment would allow publicity on both.

"Functions" are usually taken to mean both the duties and powers of local authorities, but they also include a range of discretionary powers that local authorities may or may not use. On the other hand, services would appear to be activities undertaken by a local authority, whether under mandatory duties or discretionary powers. The point of the distinction might be to exclude some publicity by one local authority about the exercise—or more likely non-exercise—of discretionary functions by other local Government bodies. For example, it would prevent a metropolitan district council from issuing publicity about the non-use by a passenger transport joint board of its discretionary powers to set concessionary fares. The amendment takes the sensible course of adding a reference to functions, and the exercise of them. Unless the Government are deliberately and actively trying to cause confusion, we cannot see why they should not accept the amendment.

Voluntary organisations will also face problems. Our amendment would broaden section 142 so that local authorities would be much less dependent upon the use of section 137 for the purpose of allowing voluntary organisations to publicise their functions. A number of hon. Members on both sides of the House are active in voluntary organisations of many different kinds and will be aware of the necessity for, and will support, the amendment.

[Mr. Boyes]

It seems peculiar that money can be used only where publicity is incidental. We cannot understand why it is that if a voluntary organisation asks for £1,000 for publicity purpose—for example the printing of a newsletter—it is not allowed to have that £1,000, but it can apply for a grant of £10,000 and use £1,000 of it for that purpose, because the printing of the newsletter is incidental to the purpose. I would be grateful if the Minister would say something about that unnecessary distinction.

Widdicombe recognised that if local authorities were to be prohibited from using section 137 for their publicity, this prohibition would have to exclude voluntary organisations, or a number of important projects such as welfare rights campaigns would also be prohibited. Therefore, he proposed, in paragraph 244(d):

"the exclusion of publicity from section 137 . . . should be so framed as not to prevent bodies funded under that section from issuing publicity to promote their own aims and objectives provided they are not acting as proxies for local authorities in unauthorised publicity".

Unfortunately, as in many other instances in this Bill, the Government do not follow Widdicombe's wording.

In another place an amendment by Lord Hayter said that local authorities could incur expenditure to enable a public body or voluntary organisation to promote its own aims and objectives, providing such publicity is not otherwise prohibited. However, the Government argued on 13 March 1986 in the other place that voluntary organisations had sections 142(1), 142(2)(a) and 137(3) available for financing them except for—and a most peculiar and disparaging word was used by the Minister—a whole range of sometimes "curious" single-issue campaign groups. I have carefully read the speech of the Minister in the other place and not once does he define in any way what he means by a "curious" group? We would argue that the so-called "curious" group, which could include such things as a welfare rights take-up campaign, could not get sections 142(1), 142(2)(a) or 137(3) to finance it and if it were requesting a grant to cover costs of publicity it could not get section 137(1) cash either. We are of the opinion that the widening of section 142 would mean that local authorities could fund a far wider range of voluntary organisation publicity and there would be no danger of it becoming a loophole for political publicity because the prohibition in clause 2 would still apply. All the amendment does is make it lawful for a local authority to use its section 142 powers to fund a wider range of campaigns including such things as hospital closures and welfare rights take-up.

I am concerned about the limiting of expenditure to the 2p. Our amendment is simple in its declaration that section 137 is a function for the purposes of section 142 but it improves the financial position by not making such expenditure count against the 2p limit. My area, Tyne and Wear, has the highest rate of unemployment in Britain. On April 1 Tyne and Wear metropolitan council will be abolished. That means that we lose the product of a 2p rate that could be spent to enable us to create new jobs and protect existing jobs.

Mr. Holt rose——

Mr. Boyes: I have asked the Minister a number of times why he will not double the amount of money that the other authorities in the metropolitan county areas can raise so that they can carry out essential functions after the metropolitan counties and the GLC have been abolished.

Mr. Holt rose——

Mr. Boyes: I am not giving way. I have finished.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels My concern with amendment 4 is that it will weaken the Bill, especially by paragraph (c) where, instead of "matters relating to local government" the amendment would insert matters "relating to the functions of the authority."

Many things relate to the function of an authority but not to local government. The local authorities have the function of being responsible for civil defence, so that under the amendment they could support the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, as the authority does in Leicester city, or nuclear free zones, which have already cost the citizens of Leicester more than £1,500.

This is an unwelcome amendment, because it will give power to authorities such as Leicester to indulge in national politics at a local level. In other words, Leicester city will be able to undertake national campaigns against the deregulation of buses and the Transport Bill, as indeed it did on local government reform, or against the social security Green Paper. This is totally unacceptable. The advertising expenditure on national campaigns was £209,800 in 1983-84, £284,400 in 1984-85 and £377,300 in 1985-86. The amendment is therefore unacceptable to me, and I very much regret the fact that the House of Lords has sent it to us for approval.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Two of the amendments selected for discussion in this group are in the name of my right hon. and hon. Friends. The first is on a specifically London point. Several of the amendments suggest additional authorities about which local authorities should give information. It is suggested for example, that the health authorities, the gas boards or the electricity boards should fall into this category and that it would be relevant for the local authority to provide information about them. We believe that we should add not just the fire, civil defence and police authorities elsewhere, but also the police authority in London, which at present is excluded. The specific reason is a practical one. The police authority in London is the Home Secretary. That does not change the point that it is appropriate for local authorities, for example, to give information to the public about general crime prevention, neighbourhood watch or anti-theft measures, and it is a ludicrous anomaly that such information might be excluded by the provisions of the Bill.

Our amendment (a) relates to Lords amendment No. 6 which now allows that expenditure should be permitted on the promotion of the economic development of an area relevant to the local authority. We do not believe that the local authority should be allowed to spend money on promoting the economic development of an area only if the expenditure is incidental to other expenditure on economic development under section 137 or 142 or otherwise.

We agree with the Widdicombe interim report that, generally, powers of publicity should be under section 142, and our two selected amendments tie in with that. For reasons that the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) has advanced and that are well known to all who have an informed concern about these matters, we do not believe that money should be spent on information only if it is incidental to the main purposes. We do not believe, as the Government believe, that information should be excluded if that is the only purpose for which funding is provided by local authorities.

The Government have still not appreciated the nature of the practical responsibilities of local government. I hope that they will show signs of being willing to learn from the suggestions of amendment (f)—which we will support if it is pushed to a vote—the amendments in the names of right hon. and hon. Friends and the other amendments that would make the measure more relevant to the day-to-day needs of local councils.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) commented on the use of the word "curious" to describe single-issue bodies. Single-issue organisations sin more often through misadventure than through malice. Enthusiasts for a certain cause get together. They tend to mix only with others who are similarly interested in that cause. Little by little they often lose sight of the alternative argument—the alternative way of answering the question that lies at the heart of the allocation of priorities outside their own narrow circle. Their newsletters and literature and their applications to local authorities for grants are often perceived by others who do not share their central preoccupation as being subversive and one-sided. One sided they often are. Subversive they very seldom intend to be, although sometimes they are subversive.

I should be glad if there were a longer period in which to assess the effects of this legislation, because considerable dangers affecting the central functions of many voluntary organisations are enshrined in too narrow a definition. I should like the Bill to be interpreted in a spirit which encourages people to fight for their corner but which also lays upon them an obligation to look beyond their own narrow interests and to take into account the often extremely respectable arguments that weigh against their preferred solution.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) said that the widening is in response to the points that were put to the Government first by parish councils and then, in another place, by other local authorities. We have tried to meet those concerns in a reasonable way by saying that in addition to being able to publish information relating to their own functions, local authorities will be able to publish information relating to the services of the different tiers of local authorities. As the hon. Gentleman said, we could have widened it to include the functions of other authorities. We thought that "services" was a reasonable compromise, and the Government stand by that decision.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the incidental publicity of voluntary organisations. Our purpose has been to follow Widdicombe: to get rid of the information function per se in section 137 and put it into section 142. However, in relation to the hon. Gentleman's 2p rate point we have had to follow the recent court judgments and say that information under section 142 that is incidental to a function under section 137 should, like the other overhead costs of section 137 functions, be charged to the 2p rate. I think that is the right decision. The hon. Gentleman's other points on the 2p rate are not a matter for discussion tonight, but we are well aware of the anxieties in the ex-metropolitan areas about them.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) referred to the Metropolitan police. His point on crime prevention is reasonably met by the housing powers of boroughs. To give a general power to local authorities to comment on the Home Secretary as a police authority would represent a great widening of their powers which we do not intend to implement in this Bill. The hon. Gentleman's amendment No. 6 (a) would widen the powers of local authorities and enable them to carry out publicity campaigns on economic development. We do not wish to give new powers to local authorities to fund economic development promotion in advance of the Widdicombe inquiry's main report. I urge him, therefore, not to press that amendment.

This meets the reasonable concerns of hon. Members and of another place that local authorities should be able to comment on each other's affairs in a reasonable way. I am aware of the anxiety of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) that the Government may have gone too far, but the powers of local authorities are being very considerably constrained and we have to decide where to draw the line. If we made it impossible for local authorities to comment on each other's services or to give information on each other's services, we should find ourselves in considerable difficulties. Therefore, I must ask for my hon. Friend's indulgence.

Question put, That the amendment to the Lords amendment be made:—

CODES OF RECOMMENDED PRACTICE AS REGARDS PUBLICITY

Lords amendment: No. 10, in page 3, line 25, at end insert

"for the guidance of local authorities in determining whether to incur expenditure on publicity."

Mr. Waldegrave: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take also Lords amendment No. 14.

Mr. Waldegrave: The amendment deals with the codes which is the other principal commitment which my right hon. Friend has had to make on this matter. We believe that more power is needed to the elbow of the code which we seek to agree with local authorities and for which my right hon. Friend has the ultimate responsibility. We greatly regret the loss of the words "have regard to" which the Lords removed from the Bill. We do not think that the code is left with enough power as it stands and we will seek to consult the local authorities to try to agree the code in the meantime.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The Minister's words almost stuck in his throat as he moved that we should accept the Lords amendment. He faced similar difficulties in Committee in response to his hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) and when he promised to look at the matter on Report. In Committee, the Minister tried out a code and faced such overwhelming objection to parts of that code and over the problem whether the code should be enforced in statute, that in the end he was forced to withdraw it.

Mr. Waldegrave: I know that the hon. Member is a fair man and I know that he would not want to misrepresent the matter. In response to the Committee asking us to produce some outline ideas about the kind of material which might be in the code, we quickly produced those ideas. The ideas were not a code or a draft and it was not withdrawn. The hon. Gentleman is misleading the House on this matter.

Mr. Meadowcroft: If the Minister did not want to try out on the Committee a code which might have had some effect, he should not have produced one at all. As I understood it, the code that was produced was an adapted code of the sort used in the Civil Service. That is what it was incumbent for the Government to adhere to in their practices, and the same type of code and principles should apply to local government.

The hon. Member for Halifax argued very cogently that if a code was brought in it should have the force and approval of the House and of another place. As it was not possible to do that in such a form, the Minister understandably withdrew the code and undertook to re-examine it again on report.

On Report, the Minister said that we should look at the code after the amendments had been tabled in another place. Of course, in another place an amendment was passed that went counter to what the Government wished, rather than being in their favour. It is significant that in the other place it was accepted that the code should be voluntary. It was not suggested that it would be other than for guidance. At that point, the all-party amendment that was eventually passed in the other place was moved by the noble Lord from the Conservative party, Lord Campbell of Alloway. That made the point very logically that, if the code was for guidance only there was clearly no point in having the words "have regard to" in the Bill. Lord Campbell argued that it would not be subject to judicial review and that there would be no power behind it to go to judicial review if it was for advice only. The other place therefore agreed, understandably, to take out that provision.

The point behind the Bill is that local government processes and conventions on acceptable action have broken down. If it is argued that a local government is abusing its powers by putting out propaganda, there is clearly no point in producing a code of practice based on good will because, by definition, good will has gone.

It is incumbent on the Minister either to produce a code of practice to which authorities must adhere and which has the force of law or to abandon the code completely. Their Lordships did the next best thing and simply said, "Let us accept explicitly that the code is for guidance only." They removed subsection (6), which contained the words "have regard to". That was at least partially sensible. We therefore wish to support the Lords amendment.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I very much regret that we are asked to support these key amendments, because they make a mockery of the code. I take issue with the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft), because I believe that the "have regard to" provision would have meant that councils were bound to treat the code of practice seriously. If they chose to ignore it, it would not be an offence in itself. If litigation resulted, the judges would have to take a breach of the code into account in reaching their verdict. The other place has deleted that provision, and the code is now for guidance only. If we accept the Lords amendments, provided the local authority has read the code, it can proceed on the basis of ignoring it.

Members in the other place seemed to be confused because, having effectively destroyed the code, they insisted that it should be subject to approval by both Houses of Parliament. If the Lords amendments are accepted, the code will have more parliamentary weight and dignity but no legal effect, which must be nonsense. To have such a code seems to be worse than having no code. It will bring the authority of Parliament into contempt. Left-wing councillors will be able to thumb their noses at the code, although it has been approved by Parliament.

This is a serious matter. Those of us who served on the Standing Committee referred to a number of worries about how the legislation would be interpreted in relation to the finer points we had noted in our constituencies. My hon. Friend the Minister was at pains to point out that, before the other place made its decision on clause 4, it would have been necessary to have measures to deal with those finer points.

These amendments are not helpful. They go to the heart of the Bill. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can assure us that this matter will be dealt with in future legislation. The code is a vital element in ensuring flexibility in the legislation.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): As my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) said, these amendments emasculate clause 4, which was one of the Bill's major pillars. The term used by my hon. Friend the Minister —"regret"—was meek in the light of the actions by the other place. As has been stated, the object of the amendments, which were passed across party lines with a substantial majority in Committee, was to give extra force to the code of practice by having it approved under the affirmative procedure by this House so that the courts would need to take it into account when making their judgments on whether propaganda issued by councils came within the provisions of the Bill.

It makes a mockery of Parliament and of the law to say that, the Bill having come from their Lordships' House, the code will be subject to the affirmative procedure, yet will be only for the guidance of local authorities. That sets the will of this House at naught.

I hope that my hon. Friend will give us some clear assurances that a firm code of practice that will be approved under the affirmative procedure and applicable in the courts will be brought before the House at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Like my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley), I am concerned about the code of practice and its relevance to the law. I am fearful that it will be for guidance only and will not be taken seriously by the local authorities concerned.

I appreciate that the code has to be approved by both Houses of Parliament. The fact is that any local authority could read it and ignore it. The Minister, I know, has received a letter from the chief agent for Leicester city Conservatives regarding a proposed new company called Leicester Publicity Ltd., which appears to be trying to circumvent the code which I should like to see have the force of law. I refer particularly to the aims:

"the Committee accepts the need for the continued provision and publication of information in the City which is not restricted to that concerning the functions of the City Council".

It continues:

"It would, therefore, clearly be of benefit if a way could be found for the publicity and information material to continue to be produced, albeit not, of course, by the city council who would not have the statutory powers".

Will Leicester Publicity Ltd. be prevented from taking over the statutory requirements which at present the local authority is carrying out? If not, there is a problem with the code and its relevance.

[Mr. Peter Bruinvels]

There is another point of concern. The chief executive of Leicester city council says:

"I recommend that the objects of the proposed company should be orientated towards the provision of publicity and information upon issues or matters relating to or affecting the city of Leicester or any part of it or some or all of its inhabitants."

Surely the code should stop any other local organisation from being set up by the local authority to promote political propaganda and deny the ratepayers a rightful say in the administration of the local authority. That must be an abuse of ratepayers' money.

Mr. Straw: When the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) spoke, I had the impression that he thought that, if the amendments were agreed to, there would no longer be any code. I am glad to see that my impression was mistaken, and that these will continue to be provision for codes. The only effective difference is that, under clause 4 as originally drafted, authorities would have to have regard to the code, whereas under clause 4 as amended, the codes are there for the guidance of local authorities.

I hope that Conservative Members will not get too exercised on this issue, and I beg them to allow time to take its course in order to see whether the law works. It is wrong of any hon. Member to imply that a code for the guidance of local authorities can be ignored with impunity by those authorities. I do not believe that any authority or council official would for one second seek to ignore a code without clear knowledge of the consequences.

While it is true that a code for the guidance of local authorities may not of itself be sufficient to trigger a judicial review — one of the points raised in another place — none the less a transgression of a code laid down by statute for the guidance of local authorities would be prima facie evidence for legal advisers that there could have been a transgression of the principal statute, giving rise to legal action for judicial review. Moreover, one of the key sanctions provided by the Bill is not judicial review but resort to the district auditor. For that, the original complaint does not have to be couched in such detailed legal language as an application for judicial review.

We believe that the change is helpful. Conservative Members who think it is not helpful would be wise to read the debates in another place, because many peers experienced in law had complaints about the "have regard" trigger. While we believe that the change is beneficial, there is not a real and significant difference between it and what was there before. For once we should give the legislation time to work. Let us see what the practice is before rushing back with further legislation.

Mr. Waldegrave: With leave of the House. I welcome the plea of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) that we should give the code as presently drafted a chance. In so far as he is adding his weight to the voices of those who say that we should have serious discussions with local authorities about getting such a code drafted, I welcome that.

Basically I agree strongly with my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) that again this has knocked a very important part out of the structure of the Bill. No one has greater respect than I have for another place, but, like my hon. Friend, having read the debates in another place, I found myself none the wiser. Some noble Lords seemed to be of the view that the code, as we originally envisaged it, would have brought all free speech to an end while others thought that it would have no effect at all. Therefore, there was not a consensus such as was sought by my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon).

I agree very much with my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley), whose amendment was passed in Committee—not at the time with the full enthusiasm of Ministers, but we came to live with it. We now have an anomaly. The effect of his amendment was to try to build up the power of the code, but the "have regard to" trigger has been knocked out.

We have "have regard to" triggers successfully in some statutes, such as section 60 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 and section 135(5) of the Local Government Act 1972. There is quite a close parallel. Local authorities are required to have regard to a number of matters, including the provision of structure plans, before deciding planning applications. This is a trigger with which local authorities and the statute law are able to deal. We shall have to come back to this in the autumn.

This is another case where I have to ask my hon. Friends to accept the amendment for the reason given by my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens)—that we want the Bill on the statute book now. Half a loaf is better than no bread, but it is only half a loaf.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 11 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 12, in page 3, line 31, leave out subsection (4).

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take the following: Lords amendment No. 13, in page 3, line 37, at end insert—

"(5A) A code shall not be issued unless a draft of it has been laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.

(5B) Where the Secretary of State proposes to revise a code he shall lay a draft of the proposed alterations before each House of Parliament and—

(a) he shall not make the revision until after the expiration of the period of 40 days beginning with the day on which the draft is laid (or, if copies are laid before each House of Parliament on different days, with the later of those days), and

(b) if within that period either House resolves that the alterations be withdrawn, he shall not proceed with the proposed alterations (but without prejudice to the laying of a further draft).

In computing the period of 40 days no account shall be taken of any time during which Parliament is dissolved or prorogued or during which both Houses are adjourned for more than four days."

Sub-amendment (a), in subsection (5A), after "issued" insert "revised".

Sub-amendment (b), in subsection (5A), leave out "it" and insert "the code or revisions".

Sub-amendment (c), leave out subsection (5B).

Mrs. Rumbold: I am sure that hon. Members will agree with the principle behind amendment No. 12, which was discussed in the House on Report. We consider that a code of practice issued under clause 4 should be subject to the scrutiny of both Houses of Parliament.

Mr. Boyes: Amendment No. 13 and sub-amendments (a), (b) and (c) are in response to the Government's defeat in Standing Committee, when a combination of Opposition parties and some Conservative Members decided to vote with us, which I suspect was much more embarrassing to them than it was to us.

As originally drafted, the code of practice was not subject to any parliamentary procedure. The Opposition voted with what could be described in some newspapers as the "St. Andrews Mafia" to provide for the code of practice to be subject to an affirmative vote in the House of Commons. Because of bad drafting, which has been a feature of the Bill the House of Lords appears to have been left out. The Opposition amendment along the same lines in Standing Committee included the Lords.

The Government have conceded half the case for the affirmative procedure, by making the initial code of practice subject to that procedure, but illogically allowed only the negative procedure for revisions to the code. Government Members will no doubt claim that the process of revision is likely to be made more difficult if affirmative resolution orders are required for each change. We find that argument tenuous and unacceptable.

If the amendment is accepted as it stands, it will mean that the code originally subject to the affirmative procedure could be revised beyond recognition using negative instruments. Secondly, the comparative administrative inconvenience of the affirmative procedure is an asset in application to revisions to the codes. It might encourage the Department to ensure that, in consultation with local authority associations, it gets the first draft right. Sub-amendments (a), (b) and (c) make revisions subject to the affirmative procedure and delete the negative provisions. We are introducing necessary and essential amendments to the code of practice and we hope the Government will see the logic and sense in our argument.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): In the arrangements for parliamentary scrutiny of the code there is, as the Opposition pointed out, a clear difference between the arrangements for scrutinising the initial code and those for scrutinising the revised code. I have some sympathy with the Opposition amendment (a) and the following amendments, but I would have less sympathy if my hon. Friend were able to assure me that the consultation involved in making sure the initial code is as good as it can be, will involve consultation not simply with local authority associations but with other groups who have an interest in this field, notably the National Union of Journalists. I understand that at the moment my hon. Friend is not prepared to consult the union before preparing the initial draft. The Government's case would be slightly stronger in resisting the proposed affirmative resolution for the revised code if the Government were prepared to consult more widely in preparing the initial code.

Mrs. Rumbold: The proposition of my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) would not present the Government with many difficulties and we would be prepared accordingly to widen the consultations for the code of practice.

I understand the logic of the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes), but his claim that we are proposing a change that will reduce the flexibility of parliamentary procedure for the code is rather an odd one for him to make. There may be circumstances where a revision needs to be made fairly quickly, either because of an inadvertent and unnoticed error, or because of a provision of the code which in practice proved impractical or unworkable. In such cases the affirmative procedure would be too rigid. There is a precedent for having a different procedure for revisions in section 14 of the Local Government Finance (No. 2) Act, 1982 for a code of order practice. I commend to the House of Lords amendment.

Question put and agreed to.

Subsequent Lords amendments agreed to.

Clause 5

SEPARATE ACCOUNT OF EXPENDITURE ON PUBLICITY

Lords amendment No. 15, in page 4, line 13, at end insert—

"(5) The Secretary of State may by order provide that subsection (1) does not apply to publicity or expenditure of a prescribed description.

(6) Before making an order the Secretary of State shall consult such associations of local authorities as appear to him to be concerned and any local authority with whom consultation appears to him to be desirable.

(7) An order shall be made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament."

Read a Second time

Mr. Straw: I beg to move, as an amendment to the Lords amendment,

(a) in line 5, after 'Before', insert

'the coming into force of this section and before'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we will also discuss sub-amendment (b) in line 5, after 'order', insert 'under subsection (5) above'.

Mr. Straw: The Secretary of State is empowered by the amendment to provide by order that subsection (1), which is the principal provision of the clause, shall "not apply to publicity or expenditure of a prescribed description."

Before making an order, the Secretary of State is required to consult local authority associations.

We seek by the sub-amendments to widen the scope of that consultation so as to require the Secretary of State to consult before the coming into force of the clause as a whole, on such matters as the need to keep separate accounts of expenditure on publicity. The principle of consultation by the Department in general is accepted. Considering that the clause has serious ramifications for local authorities, it would be sensible to have prior consultation about the clause as a whole rather than just about orders which provide for exemptions.

Mrs. Rumbold: The amendment received wide support in the other place. The sub-amendments draw attention to the fact that we could theoretically introduce a requirement to keep a wide-ranging publicity account without making exclusions from that requirement and without consulting the local authority associations. We have no intention of acting in such a way. It would, clearly, not be sensible to bring clause 5 into effect until the scope of the account was finally determined. I urge the House to accept my undertaking that we shall engage in a full process of consultation before introducing an order proposing exclusions of publicity or expenditure under clause 11 or bringing clause 5 into effect.

Mr. Straw: In the light of the Minister's remarks, I will not press the sub-amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Lords amendment No. 15 agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 16 agreed to.

Clause 6

INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF PART II

Lords amendment No. 17, in page 4, line 43, at end insert—

"(5) Nothing in this Part shall be construed as applying to anything done by a local authority in the discharge of their duties under Part VA of the Local Government Act 1972 or Part IIIA of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 (duty to afford public access to meetings and certain documents)."

Mrs. Rumbold: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Straw: While we agree with the purpose of the amendment, I hope that the Minister will comment on the anxieties that local authorities and community relations councils have expressed about whether the provisions of the Bill could conflict with section 71 of the Race Relations Act 1976. If the hon. Lady cannot deal with the point now, perhaps she will write to me.

Mrs. Rumbold: I will write to the hon. Gentleman on the subject.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 7

TRANSFER REQUIRES MORTGAGOR'S CONSENT

Lords amendment No. 18, in page 5, line 3, leave out "may" and insert "shall"

Mrs. Rumbold: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): It will be convenient to discuss at the same time Lords amendments Nos. 19 to 23.

Mr. Simon Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This series does not appear in the consolidated list of amendments. Can you tell me where they can be found? I appreciate the nature of them and I do not think that they raise any matters of great substance, but they do not seem to be in the marshalled list of amendments.

Mr. Deputy-Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is talking about Lords amendments Nos. 18, and 19 to 23. They are printed on the selection of amendments in front of me. The hon. Gentleman has the appropriate paper now, on which he will find the amendments.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 19 to 25 agreed to.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That this House do meet on Thursday 27th March at half-past Nine o'clock, that no Questions be taken after half-past Ten o"clock, and that at half-past Three o'clock Mr. Speaker do adjourn the House without putting any Question. — [Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

PARLIAMENTARY COMMISSIONER FOR ADMINISTRATION

Ordered:

That Standing Order No. 100 (Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration) be amended, as follows:

Line 9, leave out 'eight' and insert 'nine'. — [Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

PETITIONS

Shops Bill

1.8 am

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I beg leave of the House to present a petition on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) and the citizens of York in respect of maintaining Sunday as a day for family life away from six days of shopping.

On 19 December I presented a petition signed by 3,263 people. Tonight I present a petition signed by 2,037 people. I am assured by my hon. Friend that this demonstrates the overwhelming view of York electors who are concerned that seven days of trading will lead to a loss of employment, will not increase the totality of retail shopping and will break up family life, all against a background where there is no party manifesto mandate. The petition states:

"Whilst acknowledging the need for the removal of the present anomalies in the Sunday trading laws, we urge that Sunday remain a day of worship, rest and relaxation for the benefit of family and community life.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House reject the need for any other deregulation.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray."

To lie upon the Table.

Immigration (Guidelines)

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Mr. Deputy-Speaker, despite the hour, I wish to present a petition signed by Councillor Mohammad Riaz of Hilton grove, Bradford 7 and 1,300 of my constituents.

The petition protests against draft guidelines issued by the Home Office and to be debated by the House later today,

"relating to representation of Members of Parliament on immigration matters" representing

"a major new restriction on the entry of people into the United Kingdom, especially those visiting from the New Commonwealth and Pakistan, and a reduction in the rights of MPs to represent their constituents."

The petitioners pray that this honourable House will not approve such guidelines, and I beg leave to present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

DHSS Office, Coatbridge

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

1.9 am

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I feel sure that the House will need little by way of a reminder that this debate takes place about events in a hard-pressed constituency, Monklands West, which had had more than its fair share of unemployment, deprivation and disappointment, most notably and recently with the closure of Gartcosh steelworks, which is due to be completed at the end of this week.

Many in Scotland had hoped that the new Secretary of State's "new broom" would have prevented the kind of insensitivity to which I want to refer, and I have certainly drawn these matters to the right hon. Gentleman's attention. I take this opportunity to thank the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), for his interest in these matters.

I have to say that my constituents are not impressed with Government promises of jobs in high technology, which represent a small number of jobs in real terms, when here we have a specific Government commitment, given to me by the Minister, the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment seemingly being reneged upon in circumstances which, I have to tell the House, represent, unless the Minister is prepared to correct that tonight, not just a local disappointment but, frankly a national disgrace.

This debate is about a number of widely shared concerns. It is about the need for new office accommodation for the Department of Employment and the Department of Health and Social Security in Coatbridge, which the Minister long ago conceded are considerably overdue. It is about substantial public money which has already been spent in preparing the south circular road site—some estimate that that would be in the region of £600,000—and the profoundly serious questions which I put to the Minister.

How much will postponement—if that is what it is—cost the taxpayer? Even if the project does go ahead in May of this year is not it costing £450 a day, plus interest, between now and then—so why the delay? Worse still, can we be sure that the whole investment in this excercise has not been thrown away? Will the Minister assure us that it is a postponement and not a cancellation?

The most telling question of all, which my constituents are asking, is why, after the Minister gave a very firm assurance in writing to me, in December 1984 that he had

"despite the tightness of funds"

"authorised PSA to enter into a commitment for construction of new offices for DE and DHSS at the South Circular Road site" which he said his Department would

"purchase on completion in 1986-87"

there is now considerable doubt about that very firm commitment?

Where has the money gone? What did the Minister do—the House will expect him to accept his responsibilities—to monitor expenditure by the Property Service Agency to ensure that his promises, his objectives, and his commitments to an hon. Member are carried out?

I place on record the Minister's letter to me, dated 14 December 1984, when he wrote:

"The delay over several years in providing a new office at Coatbridge for DE and DHSS has been a result of other pressures on the Property Services Agency's Office and General Accommodation programme. These pressures will continue in the foreseeable future, but the deterioration in the condition of the existing accommodation is I know becoming very severe —and I recognise also that a decision now to relocate both Departments to the South Circular Road site could make a valuable contribution to the redevelopment of the area.

As the Minister also responsible for the inner cities, I believe it vital that Departments including PSA should bear in mind the importance of urban regeneration when determining their own programmes. I am pleased therefore to confirm that, despite the tightness of funds, I have now authorised PSA to enter into a commitment for construction of new offices for DE and DHSS at the South Circular Road site which we will purchase on completion in 1986/87.

I am copying this letter to Tom King, Norman Fowler and also George Younger".

I re-visited the existing offices just last week. What I found was most disturbing, for despite the very able management of Derek Marshall in DHSS and Pauline McMullen in DE and the vigilance of CPSA members whom I also met, the circumstances were quite unacceptable. Both buildings were constructed in the 19th century and have seen very little repairs or maintenance since then. At the DHSS I saw dampness, cracks in the ceiling, woodworm and, most unacceptable of all, members of the public huddled together in a little room and able to hear private matters discussed about other peoples' problems. The DE offers no more improvement and indeed there was also evidence of vermin infestation. All this in 1986, and to ask civil servants to stop their work to slop out water which has seeped into the building is simply ridiculous.

But the Minister need not take my word only for it. As far back as 6 August 1984 — repeat 1984 — Mr. M. Rowe, the Benefit Manager of Scotland, wrote to Mr. M. J. Mannings of the Property Services Agency saying this:

"More than a year ago you described the Coatbridge UBO as 'shockingly indequate' . . . At that time funds were available for a start in the 1984/85 financial year but a large part of this year's allocation was diverted to another project primarily, as I understand it, because there seemed to be little prospect of early progress in Coatbridge. Against that background I am shocked by the implication in your letter that the lack of those funds may now delay the Coatbridge development.

The Coatbridge UBO has inevitably deteriorated since you expressed your concern early last year, and it can only deteriorate further. I am no expert but I would not expect the building to be capable of housing our operation through many more winters."

The House will understand my feelings when on 5 March 1986 I received a letter from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, who said:

"As you know, I undertook in 1984 that PSA would purchase from the developer a new building on its completion. At that time the building was expected to cost £1·7 million and to be purchased, on its completion, in the financial year 1986-87.

Since then several things have happened to put my promise in jeopardy. The cost has gone up to £2·275 million; the date when funds are needed has slipped back to 1987-88; and the PSA has insufficient money in that year to meet expenditure on Coatbridge.

It was because I could not allow a contractual commitment to be entered into without funds being earmarked that I had to hold the project up at the last minute. I realise how disappointing this is for all concerned; and I can assure you that I am actively pursuing a solution with my ministerial colleagues in the hope that a new building can go ahead shortly. But at this point, I can do no more than promise to search for funds."

This setback to all our hopes and the doubts which have arisen have come as a shock and disappointment to everyone who has been involved in preparations for this project, including Monklands district council, whose Director of Planning, Mr. Andrew Cowe, wrote to me a few days ago, and the Scottish Development Agency, whose input in preparing the site has been massive. And I have to say in all candour that the personnel of the PSA in Glasgow, who have been involved in these preparations, have every reason to feel greatly disheartened because of recent decisions.

Perhaps the strong feelings which have been expressed to me by my constituents and others is best summarised in a letter which I received on 14 February 1986 from the project consultants Males and McDonald of Edinburgh. They said:

"In all good faith we have actively pursued this matter at the behest of the PSA's Glasgow office and we have now successfully obtained their agreement that the proposed building complies entirely with their strict guidelines for a development of this nature. Both the DHSS and DE Departments have formally approved the internal layout of the building and further, at the request of the PSA, full detailed planning permission and the necessary building warrant for phase 1 of the development have been obtained from Monklands District Council. A start on site by the nominated contractor was scheduled for 1 March with a completion date within a period of 12 months and this is following a considerable outlay by the SDA in the form of ground consolidation works.

It was, therefore, altogether astonishing to both ourselves and the PSA's Glasgow Office to hear ten days ago that funds for the project were not now forthcoming from London, when we had already been given the go ahead. In fact, at a meeting in the PSA's office in Glasgow on Monday 3 February, details of the proposed press release and media coverage were discussed."

In view of rumours which came to me in Whitehall, I must also place on record, extracts from a further letter from Mr. Ian McDonald of Males and McDonald to me dated 28 February 1986. He said:

"You did mention that there had been some suggestion that, for our part, we may have been tardy in fitting in with the PSA's timetable for this requirement. I find this most surprising, bearing in mind the way we, and all of our Professional Team, have been closely liaising with the PSA throughout the pre-contract stages of this project.

The first point to make, therefore, is that there was a considerable amount of time and effort involved in consultations with the PSA before finally agreeing the exact size and internal layout of the building. Once this had been established, a full detailed planning application had to be submitted and I feel sure that both Mr. Andy Cowe, Director of Planning, and Mr. Jack Lyall, Principal Planning Officer, will confirm that this was not a straightforward application.

It should also be pointed out that at the outset, it was made clear to us that the PSA were working to a very tight budget and it was therefore of paramount importance to achieve savings wherever possible. This I am pleased to say we have been able to do, details of which have been fully reported in our last offer dated 9 December 1985. These costs would, of course, escalate owing to the present delay. For our part, therefore, it can be demonstrated that we have performed to the timescale and remit as laid down by the PSA. The Building Contract can be commenced immediately and the building ready for occupation within the time allowed".

So we had the situation in which the need for these offices had been well established, previous disappointments had been set aside, and everyone concerned—the SDA, Monklands district council, PSA in Scotland, MSC, the Department of the Environment, the DHSS and the project consultants, Males and McDonald — were all confidently preparing themselves for the contractor to start on site on 1 March 1986, when the bombshell came. What an insensitive bombshell it turned out to be, in an area where male unemployment stands at over 22 per cent. These offices serve the village of Gartcosh where male unemployment is over 30 per cent.

The amount of co-operation PSA has received has been colossal, as one would have expected in a constituency like mine, which the Minister described as having problems similar to the inner cities. The local planning authority, Monklands district council, altered the lines of the new post office to fit in with DHSS plans, put in new roads, introduced compulsory purchase orders on old buildings near the site, and altered the main sewer. It was in no doubt—as was the SDA, which cleared the site and is preparing to purchase it from Monklands district council—that enormous public money was spent for the sole purpose of obtaining these new offices.

Even British Telecom fitted in with the PSA's proposals, and that was no easy task, given that the new building had to be constructed around 9,000 telephone lines serviced by BTs local exchange.

It is clear that everyone in my constituency, and indeed in Scotland, who knew anything about this project did his or her utmost to see it completed — and urgently. Nobody, but nobody stood in its way. Unless the Parliamentary Secretary sets things right tonight they have been rewarded by a kick in the teeth. "Caring capitalism" I am afraid, seems to have no place in Coatbridge. Until tonight, some anonymous official in Whitehall has dashed the hopes of my constituents with a stroke of the pen. We are expected to take all this on top of the industrial havoc which has been heaped upon us—once great industries have disappeared out of sight, we have seen coal and steel decimated culminating in the closures of Bedley and Cardowan, and Gartcosh itself encapsulated the blows that our people have had to endure. To abandon or even postpone the Minister's commitment to me is to add insult to injury. It is too much to ask, far too much to ask. I invite the hon. Gentleman to use the opportunity afforded by this debate to set this matter right—and soon.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): The hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) has explained to the House, with restraint, the disappointment he feels — which I know is shared by his constituents and the staff at the offices concerned — at the decision of my Department not to proceed, for the time being, with the new development he described. At the outset he asked whether we were talking of cancellation. That is not the case. We have not cancelled the project. As I explained in my letter of 5 March, we hope to proceed when we have found the necessary resources. I can confirm that within Whitehall we are actively pursuing the possibility of a solution. It is still our intention that the new building should go ahead as soon as possible.

It might be helpful if I remind the House of the background to the problem that the hon. Gentleman has brought to the attention of the House. He has explained why he feels that it is imperative that the present buildings should be replaced. The office of the Department of Employment, some 7,200 sq ft, is situated at Main street. The Department of Health and Social Security has two offices, each of approximately 6,000 sq ft, at Bank street and Muiryhall street. Those three properties are Crown owned.

I readily acknowledge that the DHSS occupied property at Bank street is far from ideal. Even if it were not overcrowded it would benefit from major maintenance. The property occupied by the Department of Employment was built in 1927 not quiet Victorian but very old. The galvanised roof is in need of replacement, and maintenance work has been concentrated on the interior of the building on the assumption that new accommodation was being planned. The DHSS office at Muiryhall will be used eventually to accommodate another Government Department and is in a tolerable condition.

The House will know that responsibility for the provision of Government offices rests with my Department. For many years, it has been the intention of the Property Services Agency — and indeed of its predecessor body — to rehouse the DHSS and Department of Employment offices in Coatbridge. Unfortunately, there have never been sufficient funds to meet every priority demand, and the hon. Member might acknowledge that, even when his own party was in power, it did not find the means to build new offices for this purpose.

The Property Services Agency normally provides office accommodation for Government Departments either by Crown building or by leasing property on the open market. Unfortunately, no suitable leasehold property has been available at Coatbridge, or shows any prospect of coming on to the market. For that reason we had to consider a Crown building, but lack of funds to finance it and a number of other problems have meant that this job has had to be deferred much longer than anyone would have wished.

In 1984 Monklands district council, which owns the South Circular road site, agreed that it would sell the site to the Scottish Development Agency if its development plans went ahead. This site, although satisfactory in many respects, proved to be undermined and the Scottish Development Agency therefore spent substantial sums on site consolidation works in preparation for a new building.

I understand that the Monklands district council had engaged Males and McDonald as its developer for this part of the town, and local discussions involving the PSA, the Scottish Development Agency and Males and McDonald identified this site as a suitable location for a new building of some 33,000 sq ft to accommodate the Department of Employment and the DHSS, and bring them under one roof. The proposal was that the SDA would sell part of the site to the developer who would put up a building to the specification of the PSA, and would sell it on completion to form part of the Crown Estate.

The developer envisaged construction beginning in 1985, and being completed in 1986, thus bringing to an end a long period of unsatisfactory working conditions.

The hon. Gentleman has drawn attention to the letter I wrote to him in December 1984, and has understandably sought assurances that the plans for the new accommodation for the Department of Employment and the DHSS in Coatbridge will go ahead. When I wrote to him in December 1984, the total estimated cost of the scheme was £1·84 million. That amount would have been needed on completion of construction, in the financial year 1986-87. At that time, I had reason to believe that, despite the tightness of funds for the office accommodation programme, money would indeed by available for the Coatbridge project. In good faith, I said that the Property Services Agency would purchase the building on its completion in 1986-87.

Since I wrote in 1984, however, there have been changes in the circumstances surrounding the project. First, partly on account of planning difficulties, the project has slipped back, and payment consequently would not be required until 1987-88. Secondly, the estimated cost has gone up by £435,000. This is an increase of nearly 25 per cent. between December 1984 and March 1986. Thirdly, there has been very severe pressure on Government funds for 1987-88 onwards. I should like to explain these reasons in more detail. First, the delay.

Mr. Clarke rose——

Sir George Young: I will gladly give way when I have dealt with those three points. The original design was for a two-storey building, but during consultation about the development of the plans it was found that a three-storey building would better suit the needs of the DHSS; and so a three-storey design was substituted. Secondly, Monklands district council required specific external treatment for the new building and the developer's plans were adapted to take account of that requirement. These and other factors combined to delay the potential construction start date to March 1986.

Changes in the size of the building from the original concept, the extra expense of external treatment to meet the council's requirements and inflation between December 1984 and the present time all have combined to push up the estimated cost.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for confirming that the cost rose because when a two-storey becomes a three-storey building the cost will inevitably be greater.

Will the hon. Gentleman explain, however, what later happened to the money if it had been found by the time of his letter of December 1984?

Sir George Young: The resources were available in that financial year, but we are talking about finding the resources in a different financial year. In the meantime, pressure on my Department's funds has increased and we simply cannot carry on from one year to another commitments that have not been discharged. Because of the pressure on funds for the forthcoming year we cannot put the project in the programme. Because the resources were not available, I was unable to commit my Department to proceed.

The House will know about the pressure on public expenditure in the years ahead. The public expenditure programme follows an annual cycle. The size and nature of commitments in the office and general accommodation programme for 1987-88 and the years beyond are currently being considered and decisions will be reached later this year.

Inevitably, there are more demands on the programme than can be met, and the Property Services Agency must be guided in part by the views of other departments as to their operational priorities throughout the United Kingdom in deciding where funds should be placed. It was because of the doubt about funding that I was forced to hold up any contractual commitment to Coatbridge when I learnt about the slippage in time. Until I have had an opportunity to look at the whole programme for 1987-88, I cannot make any firm commitments.

I am fully conscious, however, that the working conditions for the staff of the DHSS and DE, and more particularly the waiting accommodation for the public who use these offices, are far from satisfactory. I can assure the House that I am exploring with my ministerial colleagues in the Departments concerned how best to improve matters. Ideally, I am looking for a long-term solution which will provide adequate conditions in Coatbridge for many years ahead; but I do not ignore short-term improvements if these can alleviate the situation.

The exact nature of any long-term solution must depend on having funds available, but there are various ways of providing the money and I am now considering and exploring these in some detail.

I welcome this opportunity to explain the position regarding the new accommodation at Coatbridge for the two Government Departments. Unavoidable delays—which I have outlined—increases in cost and shortage of funds in the year concerned have all contributed to the change in circumstances since I wrote to the hon. Member in December 1984. However, I assure him that I am fully conscious of the need to improve working conditions in Coatbridge and that I am actively pursuing with my colleagues ways of achieving this as soon as is practicable.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Youth Unemployment

1. Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current level of youth unemployment in each of the Scottish new towns as compared with May 1979.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): At 9 January 1986 the number of unemployed claimants under the age of 18 in wards roughly corresponding to each of the new towns was: Livingston, 399; Irvine, 474; East Kilbride, 360; Glenrothes, 264; Cumbernauld, 389. Comparable figures for 1979 are not available because the jobcentre areas used for the 1979 count included populous areas outside the new town boundaries.

Mr. Hogg: Will the Secretary of State improve his means of collecting such important statistics? Does he agree that youth unemployment, particularly in young communities, is tragic, as is the loss of skills that results from such unemployment? Is there not a need for a special project to attract jobs into the new towns to cope with the critical state of youth unemployment?

Mr. Rifkind: We have improved the procedures. It is precisely for the reason that I gave that we cannot give the 1979 figures for new town unemployment, but can give the relevant figures today in the way that the hon. Gentleman has sought.

The hon. Gentleman will agree that the new town development corporations do an excellent job in attracting investment to their towns. Indeed, apart from the disappointing news about Burroughs, Cumbernauld has had good news about new jobs from British Oxygen Company, Isola and WKM Great Britain Ltd. Therefore, he will appreciate that a considerable number of new jobs have been attracted to Cumbernauld under existing schemes.

Mr. Forth: Does not the problem of youth unemployment in new towns extend throughout the United Kingdom, and has there not always been a problem because we tend to develop and build and attract population to new towns in advance of our ability to attract jobs and industry? Therefore, are we not really looking for a United Kingdom answer to the problem? Perhaps we should be seeking a way to attract industry and business to all new towns throughout the United Kingdom in order to correct the imbalance that we have inadvertently created.

Mr. Rifkind: I take my hon. Friend's point, but it is probably unwise to make generalisations about the new towns. Each new town has to be considered in regard to its locality, the availability of employment in that locality and the particular regional or other circumstances which may make it either easier or more difficult to attract employment to that new town.

Mr. Lambie: From the figures given today by the Secretary of State, he will be aware that the problem of youth unemployment is greatest in Irvine new town. Will he come to Irvine and meet the officials and councillors of Cunninghame district council, who deal not only with the problem of youth unemployment but with that of adult unemployment because every third man in Irvine new town is unemployed? When is the Secretary of State coming to Irvine?

Mr. Rifkind: At the end of the youth training scheme 62 per cent. of youngsters go into either full-time employment or full-time further education. For the remainder, there are employment opportunities during the months thereafter.

The hon. Gentleman should draw attention to the good news for Irvine—for example, the decision of Beechams to create 150 new jobs over two years; Fullarton Fabrications which has created 100 new jobs at its plant in Irvine and Stevenston, and announcements by Volvo, Telex Computer Products, SCI (UK) Ltd. and other companies, all of which are either providing new jobs for Irvine or maintaining existing jobs.

Mr. Hamilton: Is the Secretary of State aware that as a result of the Government's new industrial and regional policy Glenrothes is the only new town in Scotland which is now without development area status? Consequently, the number of new inquiries about investment in Glenrothes has fallen. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman meet the regional council—I wrote to him about a month ago, but have not yet had a reply—in order to discuss that and other matters relating to the Fife region?

Mr. Rifkind: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern for Glenrothes new town. I am always prepared to hear about the problems of individual new towns. But there has also been some good news for Glenrothes during the past 12 months. For example, McBean and Gibson International has safeguarded more than 100 jobs by securing a major contract. Forth Tool and Valve Limited, a precision engineering company, is engaged in a £1·25 million expansion project. Coors Ceramics and Wimpey construction have each announced projects that will either create new jobs or safeguard existing ones. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman welcomes that.

Textile Industry

2. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to meet the Scottish Knitwear Council to discuss the current state of the textile industry in Scotland.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to do so at present.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Secretary of State realise that if he met the Scottish Knitwear Council he would be made aware of the real apprehension felt in towns such as Hawick, in my constituency, over the outcome of the multi-fibre arrangement negotiations which are due to take place in Geneva next week, and would be made aware of the damage that could be done to domestic markets if the volume of imports were allowed to increase beyond existing limits? Is the Under-Secretary aware of the significance of those negotiations for the industry north of the border? Will he give an assurance that he will stiffen the resolve of the officials negotiating the bilaterals within the mandate to maintain the EEC limits set out there as being ceilings that are absolutely sacrosanct?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, Sir. We are fully aware of the importance of the negotiations, as is my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade. I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that the Government intend that the import levels reported should represent the maximum position of the European Community, and not the starting point for negotiations. As the hon. Gentleman said, the industry is very important for Scotland. But it is encouraging that, for example, Pringle of Scotland has announced a twofold expansion of £6 million at Hawick in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, and a new factory involving £6·6 million in Arbroath, in the constituency of my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General. That will mean 150 jobs initially, and a further 400 jobs over the next five years.

Sir Hector Monro: May I compliment the Government on their firm stand over the MFA negotiations? Will my hon. Friend ensure that pressure is kept up throughout the GATT negotiations, and bear in mind how important the textile industry is both to Scotland and to those employed in it?

Mr. Stewart: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind remarks. Indeed, I know that he recently met the Minister for Trade. We are all aware of the textile industry's importance to the Scottish economy.

Mr. O'Neill: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that he has the united support of the Labour party, if not of any other party in the House, in stiffening the resolve of Ministers in negotiating the MFA? In my constituency, the unions and the management are of one mind in agreeing that the jobs of 3,000 people in Clackmannan are literally hanging by a thread. We must get a better deal than has been suggested.

Mr. Stewart: The prospect of having the united support of the Labour party for anything worries me considerably. However, I reiterate the assurance that the Government fully recognise the importance of the textile industry in Scotland.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Scottish knitwear industry has a lot to be commended for and complimented on? When he meets the Scottish Knitwear Council, will he remind it that it is in the areas of added value and quality goods that Scotland excels and that we have nothing to be ashamed of and should not hide our light under a bushel?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is right to point to the success of the Scottish textile industry. Certainly my right hon. and learned Friend and I are prepared to meet the Scottish Knitwear Council if it wishes to have a meeting in the near future.

Mr. Steel: Does the Scottish Office have any direct input into the Government's renegotiation of the multi-fibre arrangement, and if not, why not?

Mr. Stewart: Of course we do. My right hon. Friend who was then the Minister for Trade, who is now the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and I met representatives of the industry with a joint delegation from the unions and the management some time ago. I note that the view of the right hon. Gentleman's party on the multi-fibre arrangement was expressed in the House by the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) on 13 February 1986. He said:

"I believe that there is a need for a renewed MFA for one more term. But it would be wrong to tighten it. . . . I believe that any movement should be in the opposite direction." — [Official Report, 13 February 1986, Vol. 91, c. 1132.]

Mr. Foulkes: I was about to ask the Minister if he would join me in congratulating the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and the right hon. Member the leader of the Liberal party on dissociating themselves from the remarks of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). Those remarks would threaten nearly 60,000 jobs in Scotland in the textile industry, including 3,000 in my constituency, where the level of unemployment is already 26 per cent. Will the Minister give a categorical assurance that the Government will not accept more than a 1 per cent. increase in imports from South Korea, Hong Kong and Taiwan, or preferably, will ensure that there is no increase in imports from those countries?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman made a number of detailed points which I am sure will be fully taken account of by my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade. It is clear that the policy of the Liberal party on this issue is rather a woolly one.

Colleges of Education

3. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received about the future of the Scottish colleges of education.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Since the publication of the report by the Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council on its review of higher education in Scotland my right hon and learned Friend has received about 100 representations on the future of the colleges of education. These will be taken into account in reaching decisions on the council's recommendations.

Mr. Canavan: Does the Minister agree that the destructive proposals in the STEAC report contradict the general creative thrust of that same report, which seems to be in favour of a more open and accessible system of higher education in Scotland? The Government have already betrayed three colleges of education by closing them down, in spite of the fact that in 1977 in a Scottish Grand Committee debate many Conservative Members, including the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), argued strongly against college closures. Therefore, will the Minister ask his colleague the Secretary of State to prove that he at least has some personal credibility left by giving us an absolute guarantee that the seven remaining colleges will remain open?

Mr. Stewart: I can give the hon. Gentleman an absolute guarantee that the Government have reached no conclusion on the recommendations of the STEAC report, nor shall we until the consultation period is completed. We shall, of course, consider all the representations that have been received. There is an Adjournment debate tomorrow afternoon on this important topic. No doubt there will be full attendance by all hon. Members.

Mr. Corrie: Will my hon. Friend remember that Craigie College in Ayr covers a large rural area in the south-west of Scotland and is vital to the rural economy in that area? Youngsters go from there to be taught in a college and then return to teach in that area.

Mr. Stewart: I can assure my hon. Friend that this Government are well aware of the importance of Craigie college.

Mr. Dewar: Does the Minister accept that the strategic and overall case for closure has not been established in the STEAC report, which based its projection on the assumption that there would be only 5,000 college-based students in the next decade? Does he not remember that the Scottish Education Department itself has projected that by 1995-96 there will be over 7,300 such students, and that the Public Accounts Committee has made it clear that essential information on which a decision would have to be based is not yet even collected by the Scottish Office? In those circumstances, does the hon. Gentleman not accept that, on the basis of the STEAC report alone, it would be monstrous to threaten the existence of three colleges of education?

Mr. Stewart: The STEAC report was a well-considered document. With regard to surplus capacity, I entirely accept that we need up-to-date information. My Department is therefore carrying out a computerised analysis of the available accommodation and course requirements, in conjunction with the colleges. Therefore, it will be on the basis of that up-to-date information that decisions will be reached.

Mr. Wilson: Is the Minister not aware of the continuing uncertainty in the colleges and the real worry among staff and students about the situation? Will he give an undertaking that the Government will take no action in the interim, such as reducing the staffing of the colleges of education, or, indeed, the intake of students to those colleges, which could alter the final outcome and the decisions that have to be taken?

Mr. Stewart: I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that we shall not pre-empt any decisions that will eventually be made, although, as he will appreciate, the process of being in touch on course rationalisation is a continuing process. I am aware that, inevitably, there is uncertainty at present. We hope to reach decisions as soon as possible, having considered all the representations that we have received.

Greater Glasgow Health Board

4. Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the financial problems facing the Greater Glasgow health board and on any discussions he has had with the board's chairman.

11. Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the financial position of the Greater Glasgow health board.

Mr. Rifkind: The total revenue allocation that I have made to the board for 1986-87 is £380·3 million. That is £21 million higher than in 1985-86. My hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for home affairs, health and social work has regular meetings with the chairmen of all health boards, including Greater Glasgow.

Mr. Craigen: If the Secretary of State thinks that the health board is doing so well, why does it seem that there will be a £3 million overspend this year because of the costs that it has to bear? Does the Scottish Office feel that the Greater Glasgow health board receives sufficient recognition of the amount of in-patient and out-patient work that it is doing on a wider scale for the rest of the region, or is it simply that the Scottish Office has it in for the Greater Glasgow health board because of its pragmatic approach to privatisation?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman must have a persecution complex, either on his own behalf or on behalf of the health board, because the Greater Glasgow health board is the best-funded health board in Scotland. Indeed, the allocation that it is receiving for 1986-87 is 5·8 per cent. higher than what it received for the previous year. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, that represents a sum greater than the rate of inflation.

Mr. Millan: Is the Secretary of State aware that, far from being adequately financed, the board is now facing a financial crisis? Is he further aware that in an answer that he gave on 17 March he said that, in real terms, expenditure in Scotland on the hospital services between 1978-79 and 1988-89—a 10-year period—would rise by only 6·8 per cent., which is less than 1 per cent. per year? That is inadequate for the Health Service as a whole in Scotland. Glasgow's share of that amount is diminishing because of the operation of the Scottish health authorities revenue equalisation formula, although the actual demands on the service in Glasgow are continuing to increase. When will the right hon. and learned Gentleman recognise that there is a genuine financial crisis in health services in Glasgow, that we need more money, and that unless more money is made available there will be severe cuts in services?

Mr. Rikfind: The right hon. Gentleman does not seem to realise that not only does the Greater Glasgow health board receive more on a per capita basis than any other health authority in Scotland, but that it receives more per capita than any regional health authority in England. Therefore, if the health board is in financial difficulty, that must be primarily its own responsibility. At the moment it receives a sum that represents £405 per capita. The next highest authority in Scotland is Tayside, with £369 per capita, and other health authorities receive smaller sums. Therefore, it is simply not credible for the right hon. Gentleman or his hon. Friends to suggest that Greater Glasgow health board receives other than a very generous provision.

Mrs. McCurley: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the redistribution or re-allocation of funds in the Health Service away from Greater Glasgow has greatly contributed to the benefit of other health authorities, such as Argyll and Clyde in my constituency? Will he ensure that that trend continues, as other health boards need the cash?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is quite correct. As Glasgow has been treated so generously, authorities such as that referred to by my hon. Friend, and other authorities in Scotland, will next year be given a provision for growth. The provision for Greater Glasgow health board will allow it to maintain its existing services. Other health authorities will have the opportunity to catch up with Glasgow, because they have been given a slightly greater share of the overall resources.

Dr. Godman: Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman at any time discussed with the chairman of the Greater Glasgow health board the appalling design failures in the Royal Infirmary development?

Mr. Rifkind: No, I have not. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and the Scottish Home and Health Department will be familiar with any problems of that kind to which their attention may be drawn.

Mr. Fairbairn: Will my right hon. and learned Friend tell the Greater Glasgow health board that if it wishes to increase its finance it should not, as the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) has done, take such a pragmatic—or even dogmatic—attitude to privatisation? Does he agree that if the health authorities in England can manage to raise £40 million by privatisation—a saving of 25 per cent.—the Scottish health boards, if they did not have such politically perverse attitudes, could also increase their own funding?

Mr. Rifkind: If any health boards have not properly examined the opportunity for savings to be made by tendering out to private contractors certain services which in the past have been carried out within the Health Service, those boards will have forgone a possible means of making savings which could be used to improve services to their patients.

Mr. Dewar: Does the Secretary of State recognise that the per capita comparison that he used a few minutes ago is shamelessly misleading because it does not properly take into account the enormous inflow of patients from other areas to the hospitals and specialist facilities in Glasgow? The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Greater Glasgow health board had been generously treated. If so, has he been able to convince its members — the people whom he has trusted with the administration of the Health Service in Glasgow and who presumably carry his confidence—about the fairness of the formula?

I want the Secretary of State to be specific in his reply to my next question. Does he accept the point fairly put by my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), that if we look at expenditure between 1978-79 and 1988-89, as revealed in the answer to me on 17 March, and apply the hospitals and community health service pay and price deflator, that proves conclusively that the increase in real terms is substantially below any figure that has been mentioned by any interested group to take account of demographic factors and the increase in medical expertise?

Mr. Rifkind: The various factors to which the hon. Gentleman has drawn attention are indeed taken into account in the SHARE formula. The fact that Greater Glasgow provides services for those outside its area is not unique to Greater Glasgow and is taken into account in the way that I have shown.

I am happy to tell the hon. Gentleman that health services in Scotland have experienced an increase in resources in real terms of 16·4 per cent. compared with 1979.

Hospitals

5. Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many hospitals have been closed in Scotland since 1979.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): Since 1979, 27 hospitals have been closed, involving 1,205 beds. In the same period, over 4,200 new and replacement beds were brought into use as part of projects funded from the national building programme.

Mr. Steel: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, during the Easter recess I shall receive a petition signed by 8,000 of my constituents from Galashiels and Selkirk protesting against the proposed closure of two cottage hospitals there? Does he accept that there is widespread resentment about the fact that the Government, having built the new hospital in the Borders — we welcome that — are not giving it enough revenue to enable it to be used for the purpose for which it was designed with fully operative geriatric facilities? Instead, GP beds from the cottage hospitals are being decanted into that facility.

Mr. MacKay: The right hon. Gentleman should remind himself of the petitions and campaign in the Borders in the 1960s and 1970s aimed at replacing the old hospitals with the new £30 million hospital built at Huntlyburn. It was made perfectly clear in May 1974, in the letter conveying the approval in principle to the Borders health board, that the hospitals to be closed when the new hospital was available were Peel, Galashiels, Sanderson, Knowepark and Selkirk and the general practitioner maternity beds in the Borders. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to renege, neither I nor the health board wish to join him.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that during the period in which these 27 hospitals have been closed the Government spent substantial sums on capital projects? Will he confirm that that expenditure greatly exceeded the expenditure during the Lib-Lab pact?

Mr. MacKay: My hon. Friend is right. The 4,200 beds represent some 42 major new hospital developments completed since 1979. Many other new hospital projects are under construction throughout Scotland.

Mr. Ron Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman ensure, failing the modernisation of the existing Leith hospital, that any replacement building is erected before the present hospital is demolished?

Mr. MacKay: The provision of maternity services in Edinburgh, and the provision of geriatric services, including the future of Leith hospital, are being considered by the Lothian health board. Following consultation, the health board will submit its conclusions to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for a decision. Until we get the health board's proposals, it would be wrong of me to pre-judge the position.

Macaulay Institute for Soil Research

6. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has now received about the proposed transfer of the Macaulay Institute for Soil Research from Aberdeen to Edinburgh; and how many were in favour and how many against.

Mr. John MacKay: A total of 157 letters from organisations and members of the public have been received. There is widespread support for the concept of the new institute. One hundred and thirty-four of the letters are in favour of Aberdeen and 23 have supported the objective assessment of the options, with some in favour of the location in Edinburgh.

Mr. Bruce: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the widespread concern, not only among the staff of the Macaulay institute but worldwide, that the remit for the new institute will be drawn in such a way as effectively to end much of the excellent work done there? Will the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that that would be totally against the assurances given by Lord Gray? Will he recognise that the excellent work done by the Macaulay institute can be continued only if the centre is retained in Aberdeen?

Mr. MacKay: The concept of the merger has been generally welcomed, not least by the staff of both institutes. I accept that there is controversy about the location. That is why an objective assessment of the options is under way.

Mr. McQuarrie: I am sure that my hon. Friend did not want to mislead the House by saying that the concept had been agreed. It may well have been agreed. It has been agreed that the Macaulay should remain in Aberdeen. That is the important factor. This is not a Conservative or Liberal problem. The problem is fully recognised by all Members representing the Grampian region. Will my hon. Friend ensure that when the feasibility study is concluded, which will be soon, it will be publicised in such a manner as to ensure that it is seen to be fair and in favour of the Macaulay?

Mr. MacKay: My hon. Friend has an interesting concept of fairness. I recognise that both Aberdeen and Bush estate have attractions. The feasibility study will evaluate those attractions, covering the scientific, administrative and financial aspects. We should await the study before coming to any conclusions.

Mr. Eadie: Does the Minister agree that a little correction is needed here in relation to geography? The proposition is that the organisation should be sited either in Aberdeen or in Midlothian, and Edinburgh is not Midlothian, and Midlothian is not Edinburgh. Does he further agree that as a promise was given to my constituents on the Bush estate that there would be a feasibility study to decide on the technical merit of the sites, the case for Bush estate must be considered. I demand justice and fairness for my constituents, based on the promise that the Minister gave.

Mr. MacKay: It is perfectly clear that whatever decision is arrived at will not be satisfactory to both sides of this argument. Of course the hon. Gentleman is right in saying that Bush estate is in Midlothian, and he makes a fair point about the advantage of Bush. However, as I said earlier, there are advantages on both sides and the feasibility study ought to lead us to the conclusion of where the balance of advantage lies for the future of the service.

Mr. Home Robertson: This has absolutely nothing to do with rationalisation and everything to do with cuts in spending on agricultural research and sacking 100 members of staff. Is the Minister aware that he and his colleagues stand condemned for creating an atmosphere of mistrust and fear and for forcing these two excellent research institutes to fight each other for their survival? Will he give an undertaking to consider the constructive proposal put forward by the Civil Service unions for a new Macaulay institute based on both the sites, at the Bush and at Craigiebuckler, in order to meet the growing need for land use research throughout Scotland?

Mr. MacKay: I think that shows that the hon. Gentleman is trying to have it both ways. As I said earlier, there is fairly general agreement on the sense of a merger between the two bodies, although there is disagreement about where the other organisation should be. The Government are committed to a comprehensive programme of research and development and, even after the reduction of funding, about £30 million a year of taxpayers' money will be spent in this field.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Does the Minister accept that there is no general agreement on the need for a merger? It is opposed by both institutes and by people who know the excellent work that both of them have done over a long period, so there is no reason why the question of amalgamation should have arisen at this time, apart from the Government's plans to cut them down. Will he, in the interest of an informed dialogue among all concerned, make public the remit of the steering group? The Scottish Office will make the decision at the end of the day, and everybody should have the fullest information.

Mr. MacKay: The right hon Gentleman should read again the correspondence that he has received and he will find that, as I have said, there is general agreement on the principle that it would advance and help the cause of research if these two institutions were merged. The question of the location remains to be decided, and I think that we should await the review.

Health Boards

7. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next intends to meet the chairmen of the Scottish health boards to discuss the budgets for the next financial year 1986-87.

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend the Minister with responsibilities for Home Affairs, Health and Social work met health board chairmen on 10 March, when the financial provision for hospital and community health services in 1986-87 was discussed in general terms. The next regular meeting with chairmen is to be held in June.

Mr. Maxton: When that meeting takes place, will the Secretary of State, if he is there, take the chairman of the Greater Glasgow health board, Mr. Donald McQuaker, to one side and tell him whether he agrees with his junior Minister, who said that even if the Treasury gave him £10 million extra tomorrow for health in Scotland,, he would not give the Greater Glasgow health board one brass farthing of it? If that is the case, is it not a disgrace that a junior Minister should express such a view about a city which has the appalling health record of Glasgow in terms of heart disease and lung cancer, which suffers all kinds of deprivation and which provides services for all the areas around Glasgow and for the whole of Scotland in terms of expensive expertise?

Mr. Rifkind: I was under the impression that the hon. Gentleman spoke from that Dispatch Box on behalf of Scotland's interests, not the interests of any one locality. He knows perfectly well that a SHARE formula is worked out to ensure that all parts of Scotland receive a fair share of the resources available. He also knows perfectly well that Greater Glasgow health board is the health board with the best endowment of health resources in Scotland. Therefore, it is not unreasonable that my hon. Friend and the Government should be seeking to ensure that other parts of Scotland also receive a fair share of the resources available.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Will my right hon. and learned Friend take the opportunity when he next meets the chairmen of the health boards to discuss with the chairman of the Forth Valley health board whether adequate resources are being provided to deal with the disgraceful, Dickensian conditions that exist in the Royal Scottish national hospital for the mentally handicapped at Larbert? It is a Scottish facility which is in a disgraceful condition. Will my right hon. and learned Friend satisfy himself personally that sufficient resources are being put forward to deal with the problem?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to that particular difficulty. The matter is under consideration at present.

Mr. Tom Clarke: When the Secretary of State's hon. Friend meets the chairman of the Greater Glasgow health board, will he draw his attention to the deteriorating conditions at Woodilee hospital and remind the chairman of the conditions of the staff who are living in health board houses? Will the Secretary of State accept that nobody in my constituency will regard him as generous so long as those intolerable conditions remain?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman will be well aware that the health authority to which he refers will be entitled to growth this year to ensure proper provision. Each health board can consider how the SHARE formula operates for its particular locality. I think that the hon. Gentleman's authority is one that will benefit from that, and I can assure him that the resources that will be made available will be based on the formula, which the health boards as a whole see as a reasonable approach to the matter.

Mr. Fallon: Will my right hon. and learned Friend remind health board chairmen that health spending in Scotland last year was 26 per cent. higher per head than in England? Is that not a generous and formidable difference?

Mr. Rifkind: For many years the Secretary of State for Scotland has been able to determine within the overall resources made available whether he wishes to give priority to one area of expenditure at the expense of other areas. My hon. Friend will be aware that the total resources made available to the Scottish Office are based on a formula system which allows that flexibility. Scotland has traditionally allocated a significant share of resources to health in particular, because of the emphasis on dental and medical education and other factors. That has led successive Secretaries of State to give priority to that area.

Mr. Strang: Does the Secretary of State recognise that the SHARE formula should be implemented against a background of real growth in the Health Service, to match, not just the increased, technological advances, but the increased needs arising from higher unemployment and more elderly people? Does he recognise that the problems in Glasgow are similar to those that we have to face in Edinburgh? Is it not a scandal that new geriatric facilities and other facilities which have been invested in have been standing idle in Edinburgh because of the Government's failure to provide adequate resources to the Health Service generally?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman does not know what he is talking about. Next year the provision for health services in Scotland will increase by 6·8 per cent., which is 2·3 per cent. above the forecast level of inflation. Since 1979 the number of medical and dental staff nurses and midwives in Scottish hospitals and health services has increased by 11 per cent. The hon. Gentleman might like to reflect on that.

Sir Hector Monro: In welcoming the fact that expenditure on the Health Service is the highest ever in real terms, may I ask whether my right hon. and learned Friend has been able to discuss with the chairman of health boards the provision of renal dialysis facilities away from the main centres of population, such as in Dumfries and elsewhere, where patients must travel enormous distances for appropriate treatment?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for the first part of his question. Regarding renal dialysis, the Department is considering that at present.

Mr. Steel: Will the Secretary of State explain to my constituents why the Government provide the capital for the long-overdue building of the new district general hospital, but not the revenue to enable the board to open the 30-bed geriatric unit as planned?

Mr. Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman must appreciate that when the health authority to which he refers seeks the provision of a new hospital, and is aware of the resources available to it and of the SHARE formula, which ensures that it receives an increasingly fair share of the resources available, it is for the health board to decide on the utilisation of those resources to meet its commitments.

Mr. Dalyell: Is the Secretary of State aware that it costs up to £115 for a course of treatment? Is he worried about the way in which dentists have to make decisions, not on the basis of their own clinical judgments, but on their assessment of the depth of a patient's pocket if a patient is not drawing benefit?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman knows quite well that a high proportion of patients in Scotland do not make any payment at all for the dental services that they receive. He should also take into account the fact that most dentists, and indeed most doctors, would consider it perfectly proper and responsible that they should have some consideration for the overall costs of the treatment they are giving. We have to consider the best use of health resources, and that applies as much to dentists as to anyone else.

Forestry

8. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what new forestry management initiatives are presently being considered by the Forestry Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission regularly takes initiatives aimed at improving its efficiency and effectiveness.

Mr. Davies: Will the Minister give an assurance that if the Government intend to introduce any further changes in forestry practice they will not follow the example that they set yesterday when they announced considerable policy changes by means of a written answer? Will he give a guarantee that there will be full consultation before any changes are introduced; that the results of such consultations will be made widely available; and that when the changes are made they will be made openly by means of a statement in the House?

Mr. MacKay: This week the Forestry Commission instituted two consultation exercises, one about the membership and procedures of the regional advisory committees, and the other about the role of and the inter-relationship between forestry and conservation. I know that the hon. Gentleman has a considerable interest in this subject. The one thing that there is plenty of in this area is consultation.

Mr. Corrie: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his statement earlier this week. In widening the grades of land that can be planted, does he accept that we must have good co-operation between agriculture, forestry and the environment to get the situation right in Scotland? Will he have discussions with his right hon. Friend in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to try to get some plan for the rural economy that will take these things into account?

Mr. MacKay: My hon. Friend is right. It is important to encourage new planting against the background, first, of considerable and increasing surpluses in food production, and, secondly, against the background of our enormous import bill for timber and timber products.

Mr. Buchan: Will the Minister bear in mind that the worst possible way of ensuring future intelligent management decisions is to allow to develop the practice of private sales of publicly owned forestry and potential forestry land? Will he also bear in mind that the forests of Scotland are there not only for the benefit of their owners, but for the amenity and future of the people of Scotland? Will he resist the ideological craziness of the Prime Minister in her privatisation schemes?

Mr. MacKay: The disposal policy of the Forestry Commission is still that which was set out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger), the former Secretary of State for Scotland. Both the Forestry Commission and the private sector have an important role to play in the increasing amount of afforestation in Scotland and in the important and interesting employment that it brings to our rural areas.

Mr. Maclennan: If the Minister values trees as an alternative to crops in surplus, is he thinking about how to provide farmer-foresters with an annual income?

Mr. MacKay: I am, indeed, thinking about that. It is one of the matters being discussed inside and outwith the Government. We are discussing how we can encourage farm forestry, and how to encourage farmers to plant trees in place of crops that are currently going into intervention. The hon. Member in correct is saying that one of our problems is how to find a way to provide an income for the farmer, certainly in the first 15 years of the life of the trees.

Mr. Home Robertson: The Minister is still somewhat equivocal about the Government's ideas for privatising the forestry enterprise of the Forestry Commission. When does he expect his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State to reply to my letter of 4 March in which I asked for a specific undertaking that the Government did not intend to sell off the Forestry Commission's forestry enterprise?

Mr. MacKay: The position is the quite clear one which I mentioned earlier and which I mentioned at our last Question Time. The disposals policy for the Forestry Commission is as set out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger). As to the correspondence between my right hon. and learned Friend and the hon. Member, may I suggest that the hon. Member should just hold his patience.

Financial Sector

9. Mr. Fletcher asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to promote the financial sector in Scotland, in view of the changes taking place in financial markets in the United Kingdom and overseas.

Mr. Rifkind: Scotland, and particularly Edinburgh, has a strong financial sector. I am confident that the reputation of existing institutions, and factors such as a good labour supply and comparatively low costs, mean that Scotland is well placed to face the increased competition but, more important, the increased opportunities which deregulation will provide.

Mr. Fletcher: Is it not a great tribute to the enterprise of the financial sector in Scotland that 25,000 new jobs have been created since 1979, giving a total of about 150,000 jobs? Will my right hon. and learned Friend ensure that Scottish banks and brokers are given the opportunity to participate in the Government's privatisation programme as financial advisers, as there is a strong inclination in Whitehall to look only towards the City of London?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to draw attention to the very important employment prospects that the financial institutions represent. I assure him that advisers are selected strictly on merit. I agree with him that it is of crucial importance that institutions in Edinburgh should be given opportunities that are equal to those available in the City of London to compete for this business.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Freshwater Fishing

43. Mr. Canavan asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what communications the Crown Office has had with procurators fiscal or chief constables about prosecution policy for alleged offences connected with freshwater fishing.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): Circulars are issued to the procurator fiscal service from time to time. There is, however, no special policy, since the criteria applied to these cases are applied in all criminal prosecutions.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Solicitor-General send out to all procurators fiscal and chief constables a copy of the excellent letter of 8 April 1981 that was sent to me by the previous Lord Advocate, Lord Mackay of Clashfern, in which he stated that the common law position in Scotland with regard to both salmon and trout is that they are the property of nobody until they are caught and that, therefore, brown trout, for example, in an unowned and unprotected burn, river or loch become the property of the person who catches them and lands them, irrespective of whether that person has obtained permission to fish, and irrespective of whether that person is the owner of the fishing rights? Would not such advice be timely, in view of the fact that the fishing season has restarted in earnest and that ordinary, peaceful, working-class anglers are once again in danger of being bullied by water bailiffs, landlords and policemen?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: For once I am in complete agreement with the hon. Gentleman. It is indeed an excellent letter from the previous Lord Advocate, and I should be very happy if the contents of that letter became widely known. However, the hon. Gentleman should appreciate that in addition to the position at common law, which the former Lord Advocate set out, there are now specific provisions relating to protection orders, which are very important. Similarly, he should not understate the position with regard to civil interdict if some of his constituents decide to go on to other people's land and fish where they should not do so.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that many of the fines for poaching, including killing fish with cyanide and explosives, are pathetic? What is the point of introducing such heavier fines in the Salmon Bill [Lords] if sheriffs and judges will not implement the present maximum fine?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I do not know to which cases my hon. Friend is referring, but he will appreciate that it is not for me to mention particular sentences. However, I am surprised that he said that, because I am aware that in Tayside the sheriffs have taken a very stern view of those who adopt these particularly appalling approaches to poaching, which cause the death not only of the fish that they catch but of absolutely everything that is living in the river.

Mr. Donald Stewart: What consideration has the hon. and learned Gentleman given to the provision in the Salmon Bill that convictions may lie on the basis of the evidence of one witness? How does he think that will improve the position of procurators fiscal and chief constables, and what steps has he taken to change that?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I am not sure that it is appropriate for me to comment upon legislation that is still to come before the House. However, I remind the right hon. Gentleman that under existing salmon and freshwater fishing legislation provision is already made for there to be action on the basis of one witness.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware of the bizarre practices in Stirling, and I dare say, in other areas, whereby illegal nets which have been confiscated from poachers are later auctioned off by the courts so that they can be bought at a discount by other people who can use them? Will he put an end to this practice and give guidelines to the sheriffs on this issue?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: It is a profitable activity, to which I am surprised my hon. Friend takes exception. He will appreciate that that is not, strictly speaking, a matter for me. There are provisions relating to the seizure of nets and catches. In those circumstances, additional fines can be imposed, not just a single fine.

Medical Accidents

44. Mr. Lambie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received regarding the application of the law regarding medical accidents.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: My noble and learned Friend, the Lord Advocate, and I recently met the hon. Members for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) and for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), when they expressed their concern about the law, in Scotland, on the liability to make reparation for medical accidents and suggested a reference to the Scottish Law Commission.

Mr. Lambie: Is the hon. and learned Gentleman aware that my hon. Friends the Members for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) and for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) and I attended a public meeting in Kilmarnock attended by 200 people who were concerned about the law as it relates to the no-fault procedures for medical accidents? The meeting was the result of interest generated by a recent Ayrshire court case. Does the Solicitor-General intend to introduce amending legislation to change this unjust law?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I am aware of the circumstances of that public meeting. From what has been put to me, however, it would seem that it is not a matter that would be appropriate for my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate to refer to the Scottish Law Commission. I appreciate that at the meeting a strong case was put forward for a no-fault scheme. If such a scheme were to be considered, I am sure the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that it would be a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland rather than for myself.

Representation of the People Acts

45. Mr. Maxton asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions there have been in Scotland under sections 9 and 10 of the Representation of the People Acts 1948 and 1983, since 1956.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The sections referred to do not themselves create criminal offences. However, there are offences relating to the failure to comply with, or the giving of false information in response to, a requisition from the Registration Officer under regulation 30 of Representation of the People (Scotland) Regulations 1983. Statistics on these are not separately recorded.

Mr. Maxton: That does not surprise me. Does the Solicitor-General agree that when his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State introduces his poll tax and the electoral register becomes the major source of information for the new register, the number of prosecutions will increase dramatically? Will not the fines increase dramatically? Is it not possible that some poor people will finish up in prison? Is that not a threat to democracy itself?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: It astonishes me that the hon. Gentleman has still not read the Green Paper. I shall try, very slowly, to explain to him yet again that there are to be two separate registers and that there is to be a community charge register. It is true that the fines for failure to be registered under the community charge will be greater, but I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman takes exception to that. If people refuse, to go on to the community charge register, that will amount to an evasion of tax. I should think that the hon. Gentleman would strongly disapprove of that.

Mobbing and Rioting (Charges)

46. Mr. Wallace asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland whether the Lord Advocate has instituted any changes in the use and manner of libelling of charges of mobbing and rioting, in the light of the comments in the letter to him from the chairman of the Scottish Law Commission dated 24 February; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The Lord Advocate has instructed that the chairman's comments be borne in mind when preparing indictments in cases of mobbing and rioting, and the matter is to be further discussed by me with Crown counsel.

Mr. Wallace: Does the Solicitor-General acknowledge that the import of the letter from the chairman of the Scottish Law Commission was that some practical steps could resolve the problem, rather than the introduction of new statutory offences? Using the same logic, does the Solicitor-General consider that, rather than introduce the new statutory Public Order Bill, as it applies to Scotland, he should rely more on sensitive policing, as practised by the police for many years? We should not go down the road proposed by the Bill, which could bring the police into a degree of political conflict.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I am not sure what that question has to do with mobbing and rioting. However, I recall that during the miners' strike a number of Opposition Members saw the then Secretary of State and myself to say that, in certain circumstances, they thought the existing common law in Scotland was inappropriate to deal with such public order situations.

Law on Diligence

47. Mr. Hugh Brown asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland when he expects to be in a position to announce decisions on the report of the Scottish Law Commission on the law on diligence; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The formal consultation period has just ended, although arrangements have been made for certain consultees whose views the Government are anxious to have to be able to submit their comments late. I am not in a position to say when our consideration of the comments will be completed, but I can assure the House that my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate and I wish to make early progress with reform of the law.

Mr. Brown: As the subject has been under consideration for almost 15 years, may we have some idea whether the legislation will be introduced this year or next year, particularly as there may be an increased demand for the services as a result of criminal enforcement in relation to the community charge?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The consultation period ended just a week ago. I can only emphasise once again that we are keen to have legislation introduced on this matter at the earliest possible opportunity. I should certainly by very pleased indeed not to have to answer any more questions from the Dispatch Box about warrant sales.

Medical Accidents

48. Mr. McKelvey asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will refer to the Scottish Law Commission for its consideration the law concerning medical accidents; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate and I recently met the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes). I am not aware of any evidence that the law in Scotland on medical accidents is in need of review by the Scottish Law Commission. As I have already said, consideration of a no-fault scheme to cover such accidents would be for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. McKelvey: Will the Solicitor-General nevertheless make it clear to the Lord Advocate that there is great unhappiness in Scotland about the law as it stands? Will he suggest, for instance, that the Pearson commission be reconvened to consider the operation of the law in New Zealand and to see whether a similar law could be moulded to fit the Scottish scene?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley passed me a report on the New Zealand experience, and I am ensuring that it is passed on. My information about the Swedish scheme, however, is that it is being reviewed because of the great administrative expense arising from its operation.

Peace Tax

3.31 pm

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to allow people to withhold that portion of their tax which is at present spent on arms and related purposes, and to facilitate the payment by them of sums so withheld to peaceful non-governmental purposes.

Early this morning I went to Gloucester prison for the release of Arthur Windsor, an old age pensioner who is not a criminal but could more aptly be described as a prisoner of conscience. He was sent to prison for refusing to pay a tax demand for about £100 to the Inland Revenue on the ground that he had strongly held conscientious objections to the financing of warfare.

Mr. Windsor is not a tax dodger. He tried to make the payment to the National Health Service or the Overseas Development Administration, but the cheques were returned. As a result, he became the first conscientious objector to be gaoled in this country since conscription ended more than a quarter of a century ago.

Way back in 1916, during the first world war, Parliament gave statutory recognition to the rights of conscientious objectors who wished to opt out of military service. Today, in the nuclear age, we have a different type and scale of warfare. Because of the possibility—indeed, the probability—of indiscriminate annihilation if nuclear warfare ever comes to pass, there are strong grounds for arguing that recognition of the right of conscientious objection should be extended to those who have strongly held conscientious objections to financing warfare through taxation.

The annual budget of the Ministry of Defence is about £18 billion, much of which is spent on weapons of war and mass destruction. Many people strongly object to the fact that when millions of people in the Third world face starvation, this country alone proposes to spend £20,000 million of taxpayers' money on the Trident nuclear weapon.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Over 15 years.

Mr. Canavan: My Bill proposes the establishment of a peace fund. Individuals would have the right to assign part of their tax to peace-building projects financed through the peace fund. I do not propose any new tax or any net increase or decrease in taxation. If a person chose to register his or her conscientious objection to the financing of warfare through taxation, the Treasury would make an appropriate payment for that person into a peace fund.

Under my proposals, the normal payment would be the average individual contribution to the defence budget. As I said earlier, the total defence budget is about £18 billion per year; the electorate is about 40 million. If we divide the first figure by the second, we get an amount of £450 per annum. That is how much the average person contributes to the budget of the Ministry of Defence. Under my proposals, therefore, an individual would have the right to demand that the Treasury paid up to £450 per annum into the peace fund rather than to the MOD budget.

The peace fund would be administered by trustees whose appointment would be subject to parliamentary approval and who would be accountable to Parliament. The trustees would have to present an annual report to Parliament. The peace fund would be disbursed for peace-building programmes—for example, by payments to voluntary agencies working in the Third world such as OXFAM, Christian Aid, the Catholic Fund for Overseas Development, the Scottish Catholic International Aid Fund, and War on Want.

Some Conservative Members may say, "Wait a minute; this might create a dangerous precedent. It would open the doors for all sorts of people who object to various items of Government expenditure and would encourage them to withhold their taxes." It would be ironic if a party which supposedly believes in the freedom of the individual were to deny the freedom of an individual in this case.

I argue more strongly that my Bill creates no precedent; it simply follows the precedent which was enacted in the 1916 legislation, when Parliament gave statutory recognition to those who have conscientious objections to military service. If it is morally wrong to kill people, it is also morally wrong to pay other people to do the killing or to pay for the weapons which kill. The horrific, indiscriminate nature of modern warfare, particularly nuclear warfare, reinforces the conscientious objections of those who feel that the taxation system conscripts them into paying for the most destructive and evil war machine in which this country has ever been involved.

Many people have strong moral objections to participating in such a crime against humanity. My Bill would give them the right to transfer some resources from warmongering to peace-building. My Bill is a humane and sensible extension of the rights of conscience. Therefore, I ask all hon. Members to support it. Perhaps not everyone will agree with the pacifist ideals of people such as Arthur Windsor, but nobody can doubt the strength of his conviction and the sincerity of his beliefs. British history books contain many examples of extra-parliamentary campaigns by people who had the courage of their convictions to stand up and be counted; at times they resorted even to civil disobedience and as a result were gaoled for their beliefs before this House eventually responded to their legitimate demands for a change in the law. Arthur Windsor has joined that list of brave people. I ask the House to salute his courageous example by supporting my Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Dennis Canavan, Mr. William McKelvey, Mr. Bob McTaggart, Mr. Stan Thorne, Mr. Robert Parry, Mr. Eddie Loyden, Mr. Ernie Ross, Mr. Alfred Dubs, Mr. Bob Edwards, Mr. Dennis Skinner, Mr. Allen Adams and Mr. Gavin Strang.

PEACE TAX

Mr. Dennis Canavan accordingly presented a Bill to allow people to withhold that portion of their tax which is at present spent on arms and related purposes, and to facilitate the payment by them of sums so withheld to peaceful non-governmental purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 11 April and to be printed. [Bill 124.]

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

1. Museum of London Act 1986.
2. Law Reform (Parent and Child) (Scotland) Act 1986.

[Mr. Speaker]

3. Local Government Act 1986.
4. Peterhead Harbour (South Bay Development) Order Confirmation Act 1986.

Immigration (Members' Representations)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Malone.]

Mr. Speaker: I must tell the House that a great number of right hon. and hon. Members have already sought leave to speak in the debate. I propose to impose a 10-minute limit on speeches between 6 o'clock and 8 o'clock, and I hope that those who speak before that time or who may be called afterwards will also bear that limit in mind. I think that every hon. Member who wishes to speak may then be called.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): When we last discussed this matter on 29 October last year, I explained to the House why we felt that there is a need to review the arrangements for dealing with representations by right hon. and hon. Members in immigration cases. On 11 February, I put proposals before the House in the form of a draft guidance, setting out how the Home Office proposed to handle such cases. That announcement looked forward to a process of consultation, and to this debate, before new arrangements were introduced. I am grateful that so many right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House have, in meetings and letters, offered their comments on our initial draft proposals. The consultation process has turned out to be a real one, as it was meant to be. My hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State saw a large number of hon. Members from all parts of the House to hear their views. He received a number of letters from hon. Members and a paper from the parliamentary Labour party. The results of that consultation are set out in the revised draft guidelines which I presented to the House on 19 March and which are the focus of today's debate.

I hope that today we are, as a House, showing our readiness to face responsibly the consequences of procedures and practices that have grown up over the years under different Governments. they have grown up without previous debate and without—so far as I know—any guidance to hon. Members on matters that touch the constituency responsibilities of a great many of us and go to the heart of one of the central and essential functions of the State—the control of immigration.

I have been anxious to proceed in this matter, to the greatest possible extent, by agreement. Under different Governments, the House has for many years recognised the need for immigration control. In some ways it is perhaps surprising that this is the first time that we have thought it necessary to review the arrangements under which hon. Members make representations in immigration cases. The procedures have grown up by convention, not law, and it has become accepted that, as a matter of practice, the mere fact of a representation by a right hon. or hon. Member should, in the general run of cases, be sufficient to achieve the deferment of the removal of a person from this country. That is a unique facility given to hon. Members by custom, and valued by the House. I can think of no other area of policy in which an hon. Member can unilaterally and immediately alter the course of events before any consideration by a Minister. We need to be sure that the arrangement can be handled in future in a way that tries to ensure that it does not collapse under the weight that it is asked to bear.

I hope that the central issue of today's debate will be not the nature of our immigration control but the way in which we can achieve the right balance between the ability of hon. Members to carry out their responsibilities to their constituents and the need for effective and efficient immigration control in accordance with the Immigration Act and the rules approved by Parliament.

The guidance that we have tabled is not an attempt to tighten immigration control. What we have been trying to do is to give back to the control the effect that Parliament intended, without removing the rights of representation which have been developed in the way that I have described.

We recognise the need for an immigration control which is both firm and fair. We recognise the commitment to the admission of wives and children of men who have settled here. We recognise that the system enables ready admission for genuine visitors to the United Kingdom. We have not changed the criteria under which visitors are dealt with when they arrive in this country.

Therefore, there is nothing in the proposals before the House today which changes the policy, criteria or practice of immigration control. The guidance is there in an attempt to bring order to traditional arrangements of representations which, in their sharp increase over the past three years, are threatening to undermine the control.

I give the updated figures. In each of the three years 1980, 1981 and 1982, representations by right hon. and hon. Members were made in about 1,000 cases involving refusal at a port of entry. The number of cases has increased in each year since then to about 2,500 in 1983, 3,500 in 1984 and about 5,700 in 1985.

In the first two months of this year the number of representations in ports cases has been about 1,200, at what is usually the lightest period of the year. That would make an annual total of over 7,000 cases. Those figures do not include second or subsequent representations on the same case.

I must underline the fact that the growth in representations has occurred without any change in the law regarding the admission of visitors, without any material change in the rules and without any change in the criteria applied by the immigration service.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I am sure that the Home Secetary would wish to be fair in what he has said about the increase in Members' representations. I am sure that he will agree that that reflects the increased number of refusals. Only a small number of people who are refused entry into Britain turn to a Member of Parliament for assistance; as there is no effective right of appeal, that is not surprising. Therefore, will he give the figures for the number of people refused entry last year, which was substantially above the figure for 1984?

Mr. Hurd: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's analysis. Between 1982 and 1983 there was a 14 per cent. increase in refusals but a 150 per cent. increase in representations. As I have said, there has been no change in the criteria applied by the immigration service.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Can my right hon. Friend reveal how many representations in that shocking rise come from Members who are not connected with the constituency involved? Of those, how many hon. Members fail to put their representations or reasons for delaying the deportation in writing within the 12 days which is requested?

Mr. Hurd: I cannot give that information. The last time we debated this subject we looked back over such points as my hon. Friend raises. I am rather keen to look forward today to the kind of guidelines which would seem reasonable to the House for the future and which, incidentally, would deal with some of his points.

The effect of the process that I have described has been to draw more and more immigration officers away from their work at the initial control; that has slowed down the clearance of the huge majority of passengers who are eligible for admission.

The process of handling the volume of contested cases has meant that ineligible passengers have been able to spend long periods here on temporary admission while their cases were being considered. That is obviously not the control that Parliament intended or that the public have a right to expect us to operate. I hope the House will accept that I am concerned that, unless the system of making and handling representations is improved, it will crack under its own weight as passenger traffic continues to rise year on year.

I should add, to complete the general picture of the problem that we face, that the number of representations made about immigration cases generally—that is to say, after entry as well as on entry cases—increased from about 9,000 in 1981 to just over 16,000 in 1985. Those are the concerns that have led to the guidance and the process of consultation.

The latest version of the guidance, which follows consultation, differs from the draft guidelines announced on 11 February in several respects, but not in relation to the central issue of the need for sensible time scales to be accepted for the making of representations. That is the principal element in making our arrangements work.

The new guidance does not include the facility that we originally suggested for right hon. and hon. Members to contact the immigration service at ports to arrange deferment of removal, and to obtain the reasons underlying the decision to refuse leave to enter. The intention behind this proposal, which was put forward in response to views expressed by some right hon. and hon. Members, was that Members of Parliament would be better able to judge, on the basis of the information that they obtained direct from the ports, whether representations to Ministers were justified. These are issues of practicality, not great questions of principle.

To represent those original proposals as being in some way unconstitutional or as somehow restricting the rights of Members of Parliament seemed to me to puff up out of recognition something that is essentially a question of convenience.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Hurd: Perhaps I may finish this part of the argument before giving way to the hon. Gentleman. I may have met his point by then.

There was, and is, no suggestion at all that a right hon. or hon. Member should be denied the right to make these representations either to me or to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State. The question was simply whether the "stop", which normally precedes any representations, should be imposed by a Member of Parliament, as happens now, through a private office, or whether it should be imposed by a Member of Parliament in direct communication with the port, which would enable him to learn more of the case before deciding whether to impose a stop. At that stage, there is no question of representations. Hon. Members do not need to make representations or to convince anyone in order to impose a stop. The question is what channel should be used. Does the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) still want to intervene?

Mr. Faulds: Yes. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned that there had been consultations prior to the issuance of the first guidelines. If that consultation had been as wide as it should have been, the foolhardy and misguided first guidelines would never have been introduced. I cannot remember that I was consulted about these matters, and I have as many immigration cases as most other hon. Members.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman's intervention neatly illustrates one of the laws of politics, which is that whenever one begins to consult people, they immediately say that one should have started consulting them earlier.

Mr. Faulds: Did the Government consult before the guidelines?

Mr. Hurd: We consulted right hon. and hon. Members on the basis of the first draft; that is how we arrived at the second draft. [Interruption.] We consulted, and the results are before the House. But in response to the feeling expressed by right hon. and hon. Members in several parts of the House, we proposed to retain the present facility of ringing my private office, or that of my hon. and learned Friend, to ask for the removal of a passenger to be deferred while representations are made and considered. I am therefore ready to see whether that traditional channel for the imposition of a stop can effectively be sustained——

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hurd: I will give way later. Perhaps I may be allowed to get on.

Ms. Short: It is on a point that the Home Secretary raised.

Mr. Hurd: Very well.

Ms. Short: The right hon. Gentleman said that there was absolutely no constitutional point in these guidelines. I must challenge that. The guidelines say that if a Member of Parliament gives honest advice to a constituent about how a likely visitor will be treated, a mark will be put against the visitor and he or she is likely to be refused. That is a serious point and represents a new development.

Mr. Hurd: I shall come to the point.

Hon. Members have expressed concern about the role of the constituency Member of Parliament. The draft guidelines have been amended to reflect the need for hon. Members to act for a colleague when he or she is not available. I would not want to go further than that in the draft guidelines, but I assure the House that these arrangements will be operated flexibly. I assure the House, too, that there is no intention to change the existing arrangement whereby the staff employed by hon. Members can make representations on their behalf to my private office or to that of my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State.

In the revised draft guidelines, we also thought it right to clarify the proposal about temporary admission and detention. There is no intention—I must underline this to the hon. Lady the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short)—to apply anything other than the normal criteria for the grant of temporary admission in cases where a passenger has received advice from right hon. and hon. Members before travelling to this country.

However, temporary admission will not be granted readily if there is clear evidence that a right hon. or hon. Member has advised a passenger, who he knows is most unlikely to be granted admission, to travel without entry clearance on the presumption that he will gain access to the country on temporary admission simply as a result of representations made to me or my hon. and learned Friend. We think that it would be wrong to allow passengers refused leave to enter to benefit in that way. Temporary admission is designed as an alternative to detention and not as a variant of leave to enter.

Mr. Faulds rose——

Mr. Hurd: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman. He has said his piece.

We have also taken the opportunity to explain in the guidance the provisions of the immigration rules relating to marriage and the effect of them on those who become engaged to marry, or who marry while on temporary admission. The rules require those who wish to come here to marry to obtain prior entry clearance from abroad. We think that it would be unfair to those who abide by the rules and seek entry clearance from abroad to allow those who become engaged or who marry while on temporary admission to gain advantage by avoiding the requirements of the law in that way.

We have seriously considered a practical point which has been made on both sides of the House, about time limits for making representations. It is crucial if we are to get the balance right, to have sensible time limits. We propose an increase fom 10 to 12 working days for port refusal cases. I accept that there will have to be reasonable flexibility to deal with cases in which right hon. or hon. Members face real difficulties. However, we shall be looking to see that the limits are properly observed.

In the revised draft guidelines, we have also reflected the concern which some right hon. and hon. Members have felt about after-entry cases in which there is no right of appeal or where that right has not been exercised. We accept that obtaining information in those cases may not always be as simple as it should be when an after-entry case has been dealt with by the appellate authorities, so we propose that the same twelve working days time scale should be applied.

I hope that, in putting out the guidance, we are clarifying for right hon. and hon. Members the way in which my hon. and learned Friend and I have to approach the cases put to us. There is still some discussion and dispute about that point. As the guidance explains, in passenger cases the decision in law is properly that of the immigration officer. The law provides for the right of appeal from abroad against an adverse decision. When we receive representations from right hon. and hon. Members, we are being asked to override the decision of the immigration officer outside the appeal machinery. Therefore, we must look for new information that was not before the immigration officer. That information has to be compelling if it is to push us towards overturning the earlier decision.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): If 12 days can be difficult, five days—in the case of making an appeal where an appeal has been dismissed and the Member requests deferral—can be virtually impossible. That is especially so not only for mail delays in representations, but if a law centre wants to make a detailed point on new and significant information. That is relevant to the point that the Home Secretary was making. I suggest to the Home Secretary that the five-day period should be extended. If not, we will be in dispute on what is new and significant representation and what is representation in the first place within the five-day limit.

Mr. Hurd: The point of the distinction is that, in the cases which have gone to appeal, the facts are there. There may be a difference of view about the interpretation of them, but there is no need for further devilling about the facts. Therefore, five working days seems to be a reasonable limit in those cases, whereas 12 working days might be necessary in cases which have not gone to appeal.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hurd: I had better get on. I have given way quite extensively.

Mr. Park: I just want to make a quick point.

Mr. Hurd: All right.

Mr. Park: Assuming that hon. Members put their initial queries to the immigration service, how many extra staff will the right hon. Gentleman allocate, and what additional facilities will there be for the officers? The staff are grossly overworked now.

Mr. Hurd: We have abandoned that suggestion because a considerable number of right hon. and hon. Members did not think that it was the right way of doing it. I have tried to explain why I have put forward the proposals, but I may have confused the hon. Gentleman. We are not pressing that point now.

Such is the guidance that we propose, after the consideration that we have given to all the views that have emerged from the process of consultation. In addition to that review, and because we expect further pressure on the ports, we have increased the staffing provision for 1986-87 by 52 posts over those originally planned, and announced further financial provision for the immigration service in later years of about £3 million per year.

The new scheme for handling representations, together with the increased provision that I have just announced for the immigration service, provide a firmer basis for facing pressures on immigration control this year than last year. However, we cannot be sure that the steps that we have taken and the measures that we propose will meet all possible contingencies in the coming months.

I have no doubt that the vast majority of people in this country want a firm immigration control to be sustained. I should like to see that achieved by continuing to take full advantage of our traditional arrangements of relying on the judgment of immigration officers at the ports of entry, as the law provides, but the strain placed on our on-entry system of immigration control from rising passenger traffic, increased refusals and the growth of representations will remain severe. It strains the patience of the vast majority of passengers waiting in line for a brief interview with an immigration officer; it strains the commitment and job satisfaction of staff; it strains the effectiveness of the control itself. Therefore, we shall have to keep a close watch on the way in which that position develops during the summer and be ready, if necessary, to adapt further our arrangements and systems.

Mr. Faulds: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hurd: I shall give way at last to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Faulds: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman because he will know that those of us who are sitting around here are immediately and intimately connected with these particular problems. I very strongly support—[Interruption.] If you do not like it, you do not have to listen. If you are quiet, I will get it over quicker.

I very strongly support the length of term in which hon. Members are allowed to make representations. I think that that has been abused in the past. But one of the real problems about the length of stay of those who come in on temporary admission is the lack of staff in the Minister of State's office. If there were more people dealing with the problems in his office, temporary admission would not be as extended as it frequently is in many, many cases.

Mr. Hurd: My hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State has a substantial number of staff. I am sure that he will want to take up the hon. Gentleman's point when he replies.

My judgment, as far as I can make one this afternoon, is that the proposals that are now before the House, which have emerged from the helpful process of consultation, are sensible and will help to enable right hon. and hon. Members to discharge their responsibilities in a way that is more compatible than previously with an effective immigration control. I intend that the new changes should be introduced from 1 May. I commend the proposed arrangements, and I trust that they will be welcomed by the House.

4.4 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Last Friday afternoon, just before I left the House for the weekend, I received a telephone call from a woman in my constituency. She told me that she was expecting her mother to arrive at Heathrow on Sunday afternoon, on a family visit. She wanted to know all the telephone numbers at which I would be available throughout Sunday in case her mother had any difficulty in being admitted.

I regularly receive such telephone calls, together with similar letters and visits to my constituency advice bureaux. Sometimes the visitor does indeed have trouble and I am telephoned and asked whether I can sort it out. Sorting out such a problem can take many hours, even days. Sometimes, as in the case last weekend, there is no trouble and the visitor is admitted without difficulty, but in each of those cases, whether I am called upon to assist or not, there is, on the part of my constituent, the apprehension of trouble, the fear of trouble, the need to take advance precautions against trouble.

Those telephone calls do not come from constituents of mine expecting visitors from the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand or even South Africa. They do not come from constituents expecting visitors from Poland, although I am proud to say that I have substantial numbers of constituents of Polish origin. No, those calls come from constituents whose families originate from Pakistan, India and Bangladesh. It is the discrimination against visitors from those and a certain number of other countries, mainly in the new Commonwealth, that lies behind the debate.

That discrimination is demonstrated in the published statistics. They show that, for example, in 1984, a passenger from Ghana had one chance in 22 of being refused admission to this country while, for Canadians, one in 8,890 was refused admission. Refusals to passengers from Canada were 0·01 per cent., one hundredth of 1 per cent. of those seeking admission. The figure for Australia was 0·02 per cent., and for New Zealand and the United States it was 0·03 per cent. For India refusals were 0·9 per cent., nine tenths of 1 per cent. —90 times the Canadian average.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: Not just yet. In a little while.

The figure for Pakistan is 1·3 per cent., 130 times that of Canada. For Bangladesh is 1·7 per cent., 170 times the Canadian average. What is more, the discrimination in the refusal rate has been growing. The tiny Canadian percentage is half what it was in 1978, the last year of the Labour Government. The Australian and United States percentages are unchanged. The New Zealand percentage is up by 50 per cent. but the actual percentage increase of 0·01 per cent. is scarcely worth noticing. The actual number of refusals is up from 18 to just 27, in a year. Pakistan, too, has a 50 per cent. increase, but that means that the number of refusals is up from 946 to 1,415. The figure for Bangladesh is up by 77 per cent. and for India by 130 per cent.

There is a huge differential between the treatment of travellers from the old Commonwealth and the United States on the one hand, and the new Commonwealth and Pakistan and the other. That differential has widened. However, it is not simply statistical. It is subjective as well. British citizens whose origins lie in the new Commonwealth and Pakistan feel that they are being treated differently and worse. They believe that that difference is due to racialist attitudes—[Interruption.] That is what they believe. That is what my constituents tell me when they come to see me.

Mr. Marlow: May I help the right hon. Gentleman? Is it not the case that the economic differences between the United Kingdom and the Indian sub-continent are much greater than those between the United Kingdom and the old Commonwealth and the United States? Therefore, is it not the case that many people from the Indian sub-continent would wish, one way or the other, to gain entry to the United Kingdom, whether it is legal or not? Therefore, is not vigilance right and proper? Can the right hon. Gentleman not tell his constituents that that is why those differences occur?

Mr. Kaufman: When women constituents of mine have fallen in love with a man in India or Pakistan, and when they are born in this country and are British citizens, telling them that they are not allowed to marry the man of their choice and live with him in the country of their nationality is not something that I find easy to explain. The hon. Gentleman may be more persuasive than I am. I shall cover the other matter which the hon. Gentleman raised in the course of my speech.

Constituents seek the help of their Members of Parliament because of their subjective feelings. In the context of this debate, we are not talking principally about those people seeking admission for permanent settlement in Britain. Instead, we are talking about would-be visitors, the people who just wish to come to this country for a short time and then leave. The House should be aware that if these people are admitted, almost all go away again. These people are not dominated by some passionate yearning to enter this country as visitors and then to go into hiding in order to benefit from the right to live under Thatcherism.

People given temporary admission are, in the Government's eyes, by definition, the most suspect group as they have not been allowed to exercise their right as visitors to enter automatically. Even in that group, in 1984, only 2 per cent. failed to leave this country. People, mainly from the Indian sub-continent, approach Members of Parliament because they have found that their visitors are not being admitted.

Such requests for help have given rise to the stop system under which a Member of Parliament has the right to prevent a removal until a ministerial reply has been obtained on the request for admission. Although the number of requested stops has substantially increased, that is not because hon. Members are dealing with a much higher proportion of refusal cases. The proportion of stop cases has only slightly increased. They have increased because the refusals have increased. The necessary increase in the use of the stop system caused both by the disturbing rise in the number of refusals and the growing knowledge among those affected that a Member of Parliament can help, led to the strange events of last October and the allegations by the Minister of State, Home Office.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): As my right hon. Friend has said, there has been an increase in visits. In cases that are referred to hon. Members, the Minister's letter is often couched in terms which imply that the Minister of State has doubts about the position. In some cases the period in this country is only a few months. However, the reasons advanced for the refusal of entry are often trivial. If they were not so bloody trivial and immigration officers granted formal admission, hon. Members would be relieved of this task.

Mr. Kaufman: If would-be tourists from the United States were subjected to the kind of questioning endured by tourists from Pakistan, India and Bangladesh, this country's dollar inflow would be cripplingly damaged.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: I will not give way at this stage, but I may do so later on.

Before my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) intervened, I was referring to the allegations last October by the Minister of State. We should be fair to the hon. and learned Gentleman as it seems that he might have become overwrought by the increase in traffic last year from Bangladesh. If so, he must blame the high commission in Dhaka which issued two press notices which might almost have been interpreted as invitations to enter Britain. One, headed "Changes in British immigration rules" said:

"The Immigration Rules governing persons who wish to settle in the United Kingdom are due to be changed on 26 August 1985. The effect of these proposed changes will be that a husband whose wife is settled in the United Kingdom will be entitled to apply to join her there whether or not she has taken British citizenship."

The other press notice, headed "Visitors to the United Kingdom" stated:

"Following speculation about the recent changes in British Immigration rules the British High Commission in Dhaka has confirmed that these changes do not in any way affect visitors to the United Kingdom. There is no mandatory requirement for Bangladeshi nationals to have Entry Certificates or visas for visits to the United Kingdom."

Be that as it may, during Home Office questions on 24 October 1985, the Minister of State, answering a perfectly innocent and sensible question from my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short), suffered a rush of blood to the head and launched an attack on certain unspecified hon. Members who, he claimed, were

"abusing their right to make representations in cases."

In response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) — a question, as one might expect which was, if possible, even more innocuous than that from my hon. Friend the Member for Ladywood, —the Minister of State repeated his charge. He said:

"something is going wrong with the system because some hon. Members are abusing—I am not afraid to use that word—that system." — [Official Report, 24 October 1985; Vol. 84, c. 412-420.]

Hon. Members were naturally interested to know who those dishonourable Members might be. Demands were made for a statement and the Minister of State obliged not with a statement but with one of those bogus points of order which, until Mr. Speaker put a stop to them, Ministers have been wont to resort to in lieu of statements. The Minister of State sent me a letter in which he claimed that he was

"Setting out the various abuses which have occurred."

The Minister of State continued defiantly in his letter:

"I want to make it plain that I would not be cataloguing the abuses if I were not able to name names."

The Minister of State's letter listed six alleged abuses, none of which actually was an abuse and some, if not all of which, have at one time or another been employed by hon. Members on both sides of the House who deal with these cases. Indeed, in his letter, the Minister of State missed out the practice of one Conservative Member who actively touts for custom. [HON. MEMBERS: "Name him"]. The Minister refused to name names, but I should be very glad to name the hon. Gentleman. He is of course the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler), who sends out letters inviting people to claim his assistance.

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): That is a scurrilous slur on my integrity, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would care to substantiate his remark. The only thing that I can possibly think that he is referring to is the practice which he claimed at the beginning of his speech he operates. When people come to me and say that they have a relative or friend wishing to visit this country, I insist on a letter from the sponsor saying that the sponsor can accommodate and sustain the visitor and give guarantees that the visitor will return home. On production of that evidence, I shall provide a note saying where I can be contacted should there be any problems.

Mr. Kaufman: I have seen a copy of the letter. [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] That is a standard letter. It is a very generous, important and helpful letter. I applaud the hon. Gentleman for assisting his temporary constituents. However, that kind of letter is abuse No. 7 in the eyes of the Minister of State and was not referred to by the Minister of State.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman. I gave way to his hon. Friend, whom I was happy to name, and I will give way to any other hon. Member whom I name. I have no evidence that the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) goes out of his way to assist his constituents, and I have no material that I could use in that context.

Of the alleged abuses listed in the Minister of State's letter, some seem to be perfectly acceptable practices. Others, however, may arise from inefficiency, which is probably simply the consequence of the work load of hon. Members. In any case, such inefficiencies on the part of hon. Members are more than matched by inefficiency from the Home Office, with all its huge resources. For example, lately I have been subjected to numerous telephone calls demanding that I supply the Home Office with documents on a case which I sent to the Home Secretary weeks ago and which he seems to have lost. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman and the Minister of State need some of their own guidelines. The Opposition are perfectly ready to draw them up, as a public service.

The furore over the allegations by the Minister of State proceeded until, taking the wise advice of my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), endorsed by Mr. Speaker, the Government succumbed and provided a statement. That statement was made by the Home Secretary, offering the House its first taste of his technique of temperature lowering through obfuscation. That now overworked technique reached its nadir in his gallant but unavailing and unconvincing attempts on Monday to defend the indefensible in the shapes of the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Attorney-General.

The Home Secretary in his statement abandoned for ever the word "abuse", which has disappeared into a lexicographical limbo never to return. That time, he employed his undoubted linguistic skills as an author of dramatic fiction to allege not abuse but misuse. In response to a plea by me, the right hon. Gentleman promised, encouragingly:

"The right hon. Gentleman . . . will get the names." — [Official Report, 29 October 1985; Vol. 84, c. 839.]

Indeed, he darkly hinted that 23 hon. Members were involved, the false implication being that they were all Labour Members.

That was just about the last we ever heard of the word "misuse" as well, and it was also the last of the McCarthyite allegation of a list of guilty people. The names have never been named because there are no names to name.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): If the right hon. Gentleman is going to purport to give a history of this matter, he had better get it right. He knows perfectly well that I wrote letters to the 23 hon. Members who I was suggesting were not operating in a correct manner. We duly reported back to the House the substance of the replies made by the 23 hon. Members which, with few exceptions, were to the effect that they had no intention of giving consent to their names being revealed.

Mr. Kaufman: The Minister did not say on the radio that he would seek permission. He simply said that he would name names, not on the radio but in the House of Commons. He has now backed down from that. It would have been an interesting list if it gave the names of the hon. Members whom the hon. and learned Gentleman included in the letters he sent. One of the hon. Members on the list was the Welsh nationalist Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley). I do not think that Caernarfon is an area of substantial Asian settlement but, nevertheless, the hon. Gentleman was one of the hon. Members whom the Minister said was abusing the position.

Mr. Waddington: In fairness to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), that hon. Gentleman takes a particularly keen interest, as most hon. Members will know, in Sri Lankan immigrants. That is why he takes up a very large number of cases with the Home Office.

Mr. Kaufman: I am glad, therefore, that the hon. and learned Gentleman has now said that an hon. Member who was on his list of 23 guilty men takes an honourable and proper interest in people from Sri Lanka who wish to come to this country. [Interruption.] I say people from Sri Lanka. The Minister said immigrants. I shall come to that matter, because there is schizophrenia in the Government about the use of that term.

Mr. Faulds: The Minister of State tried, rather hamfistedly as usual, to defend himself. He seems to forget that he made generalised accusations that a number of us—orignally an unspecified number—were abusing the system. On that occasion, I made the offer that the hon. and learned Gentleman could publish any letters of mine concerning immigration cases, leaving out the names of the people concerned, that he wished to. It transpired that I was not among his 23 Members who had been accused. I am deeply disappointed that I was not among the 23. This shows how totally tendentious and misleading that original unjustified accusation was.

Mr. Kaufman: I was not among the 23 either, and I was bitterly hurt. I was grateful that, by that time, I had been successfully reselected, so that that omission could not damage me.

Ms. Clare Short: The Minister could have selected various hon. Members from both sides of the House, but it was he who compiled the list of 23. I do not think that even he would claim that it was an exhaustive list and that every hon. Member on it had done one of the six things mentioned in the letter.

Mr. Kaufman: I agree. As we now know from the intervention by the Minister of State this afternoon, the hon. and learned Gentleman has nothing but admiration for the hon. Member for Caernarfon who, presumably, was one of the Members on the list.

The Minister of State came to speak in the House on this matter again in response to a debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill on 18 December initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). By then, the hon. and learned Gentleman was in a mood that was much more amenable, I might almost say chastened. He was soothing, almost Hurd-like. He said:

"I do not believe that it would be sensible to dwell too long on what has been happening up to now and to debate whether particular practices have been very bad, not so bad or all right . . . . Surely the point is to discuss the arrangements for the future." —[Official Report, 18 December 1985, Vol. 89, c. 506.]

The Home Secretary then proceeded to publish last month what was described as guidance on the handling of representations by Members of Parliament in immigration cases. In accordance with the wishes of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I then entered into discussion on this document in the company of my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), first with the Home Secretary and then with the Home Secretary and the Minister of State. We stated our strong disagreement with a substantial part of the original document, both on constitutional grounds and in terms of practicability. Our arguments seemed to carry some weight because, when a new document was published last week—this time described as guidelines—major improvements had been made.

In the first document it had been proposed that Members of Parliament wanting a stop imposed on removal of a visitor or other person in hazard should contact not, as has been customary and acceptable until now, the Minister's office or, outside office hours, the duty officer, but the chief immigration officer at the appropriate port of entry. Quite apart from the serious practical difficulties involved, the Opposition regarded this as contitutionally unacceptable. We viewed as of paramount importance our right of direct access to the Minister, either personally or through his acknowledged personal representative. I am glad to say that that proposal has now been withdrawn.

An attempt was made in the first draft to deny temporary admission to an intending traveller if he or she had been advised directly that a Member of Parliament would seek to obtain temporary admission for him or her. That would have penalised someone for having taken advice from a Member of Parliament and was again constitutionally unacceptable. Following our opposition, that proposal, too, has been withdrawn.

An attempt was made to confine stop rights soiely to the relevant constituency Member. That proposal, too, has been partly abandoned, although the new proposals are still exceptionally unsatisfactory to us. Time scales for written representations at various stages of the process were laid down. All were very brief. Some have been expanded, but they still remain unsatisfactory.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: No, not at this stage.

The new document which we are considering today remains a document that could seriously prejudice the rights of hon. Members to protect constituents and their relatives and friends. It operates from a curious assumption implied in paragraph 2, that decisions about whether persons should be admitted to this country statutorily repose in the immigration officer. That is not so. These new guidelines say that the statutory power to admit is vested in the immigration officer, but the Immigration Act states that the statutory power shall be "exercised" by the immigration officer, and that is very different.

Indeed, that same paragraph of the guidelines immediately makes it clear that the Minister has the power to overturn the decision of the immigration officer. It is the Minister who in the end has the power, and it is important to establish that absolutely firmly.

We remain strongly opposed to the time limits laid down for representations. The 12 working days cited in paragraphs 3 and 15, although a slight increase on the original proposal, is still far too brief a period for contracts to be made between the Member and the affected persons, and for representations then to be made to the Minister. A Parliamentary recess, an illness on either side, a holiday or pressure of work on either side could prevent this time limit being observed and consequently jeopardise the rights of those who might have spent on air tickets what are for working people very large sums of money.

The four-day periods laid down in paragraphs 9 and 16 and the five-day period in paragraph 14 are still more absurd, scarcely allowing time for letters to be exchanged, let alone for any kind of sensible discussion and organisation of a case which could hope to pass the stringent new criteria for a ministerial change of mind.

We still object very strongly to the prohibition in paragraph 17 of a Member taking up a case in another Member's constituency without the agreement of the latter. Let me make it clear that no hon. Member in his or her right mind will gratuitously take on extra work in this field. Those who deal with large numbers of these cases in their constituencies, as I do, know that the work burden is as crushing as the necessity is great. It involves voluminous paperwork and, even more time-consuming and onerous, telephone calls at any time of the day or night on any of the seven days of the week.

What is to be the position of people who are unable to get assistance from hon. Members—I am afraid all of them Conservative Members—who have indicated that they will not take up such cases or whose public attitudes on these issues are such that constituents literally dare not approach them? Are those constituents to go unassisted? Such a position would be totally unacceptable, and we ask the Government to withdraw this condition, especially since it places Members of the House of Commons at a disadvantage compared with Members of the House of Lords, all of whom, according to paragraph 20 are permitted to regard the whole of this country as their constituency.

Ms. Clare Short: Yes. Outrageous.

Mr. Kaufman: After all, there are cases, including some which I have taken up, in which a Member of Parliament other than the constituency Member has won admission for a visitor or other person following the imposition of a stop. The Home Office has acknowledged that person's rights and implicitly acknowledged that those rights would have been forfeited if another Member had not stepped in. Are such people to lose their rights under the law because of an arbitrary ruling by the Home Office on a matter which is none of the business of the Home Office but is a matter for this House of Commons and for Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: As the former Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison), told the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service on 12 April 1980, when he held the position at present held by the hon. and learned Gentleman,

> "As you know, the tradition is that Members of Parliament stick to their own constituency cases. This, of course, is essentially an understanding between MPs. Certainly Ministers have no power to enforce, let alone police, the convention – heaven forbid that they should!"

I very much hope that the Government will take to heart what was said by the previous Minister of State on this matter and that this prohibition will be abandoned.

It is also unacceptable that in the narrow range of permitted cases where a Member of Parliament is allowed, under these guidelines, to take up a non-constituency case, the Home Office will in future send a copy of the reply to the constituency Member of Parliament. Such material is often personal and intimate, shared with the assisting Member of Parliament only as part of the process of that assistance. It would be unacceptable for such confidential and private material to be passed on to another person without the agreement of the affected individual. Already, those affected by the immigration rules have to put up with too much personal humiliation. This stipulation must be dropped.

We remain highly unhappy about paragraph 19, which lays down that temporary admission will not readily be granted to passengers "most unlikely" to be admitted. We are dealing here, I suppose, with people who may have applied for permanent settlement and been turned down, whose cases are under appeal from overseas, or who are awaiting an interview after an application for settlement.

We all know that the Home Office has a paranoid fear that such people may enter the country as visitors and then, in the felicitous phrase of the Minister of State, go to ground. But are such persons to be denied the right to visit this country, to spend a little time with their spouses or intended spouses, their children or grandchildren, to attend a family wedding or funeral? Much greater flexibility is required here, so once again we are looking for a relaxation of the guidelines.

Paragraph 12 is curious and dangerous. It places great weight upon recommendations made by the appellate authorities. But some adjudicators, as a matter of practice, do not make recommendations. Are people affected by their decisions to be disadvantaged by a personal idiosyncrasy? In my own personal experience of cases, some fairly recent, even if an adjudicator does make a recommendation, perhaps on compassionate grounds, the Minister is quite likely to disregard it. So, is absence of a recommendation to be a barrier even though a favourable recommendation is not necessarily a protection? This condition too must be changed.

So we are looking for major alterations in this new document and we expect the Minister of State, when he winds up the debate, to promise such changes. But, above all, we ask why such a document is needed at all. The present system has worked quite satisfactorily, even though we acknowledge that it is a considerable burden on the Home Office, just as it is to those of us who have to resort to it. But it is a necessary system. After all, decisions by immigration officers are not reached on the basis of a set of scientific criteria; they are in the end, however intensive the questioning, reached on the basis of hunch, and that hunch is liable to be faulty. The evidence for that judgment is the number of times that the immigration officer's original decision not to admit is overturned by the Minister when he has considered the case after a stop imposed following a Member of Parliament's intervention. That experience alone is justification for the stop system. That stop system is needed because facilities at the ports of entry, and particularly at Heathrow, are so inadequate as often to militate against fair treatment for those seeking entry.

Six months ago I was involved in a case whose details were so disquieting that I wrote to the Prime Minister herself about it. It related to a woman constituent of mine who had gone to Heathrow to meet her brother-in-law from Pakistan. Complicated details related to this visitor, which it was anticipated might militate against his admission. I passed on these details to the Home Secretary well in advance so that he could make the immigration officers at Heathrow aware of them. It was the previous Home Secretary, not the right hon. Gentleman. The Home Office did no such thing, so that when the visitor arrived he started from scratch. My constituent, who was in an advanced state of pregnancy, and was accompanied by two small children, was made to wait for 10 hours while the case was considered. Telephone calls too numerous to count took place between the Home Office and myself. I was in Yorkshire at the time attending a family celebration, which of course was completely disrupted by these events.

In the end temporary admission was agreed, but the visitor was not released to his relative for a further two hours after that decision, and it was achieved only after still more telephone calls from me. The immigration officers alleged that my constituent could not be found, but she had been sitting patiently for hours precisely where they had told her to sit. Having gone to London on Sunday morning to meet her brother-in-law, she did not get back to Manchester until six o'clock the next morning, having lost her night's sleep.

I asked the Prime Minister to investigate the case, and in her reply she said:

> "It is quite clear that there was a serious breakdown in communications, due to the volume of work and the intensity of pressure under which the whole staff at Terminal 3 were working at that time . . . there was an unfortunate and lengthy delay in contacting Mr. Mahmood's sponsors and implementing the decision to grant him temporary admission."

The Prime Minister offered her personal apologies to my constituents. Every hon. Member involved in such cases could provide a comparable example, but in too many cases these problems do not reach a Member of Parliament, let alone the Prime Minister. That is why the stop system is essential as a protection and a means of revealing incompetence and inadequacy.

Mr. Faulds: With reference to incompetence and with reluctance I should like to trump my right hon. Friend's story. I have a case which is now in the hands of the Home Office in which a chap who was refused entry was given back somebody else's passport on which he travelled to New Delhi, where he had to serve a term of imprisonment while the matter was sorted out.

Mr. Kaufman: That is one of the problems of the way in which these cases are dealt with. In too many cases things go wrong. I have made several complaints to the ombudsman, not about the policy, but about the administration of the policy. In his responses he has revealed serious inadequacies in the interpretation service, including faulty rotas, absences of those who should be present, and the allocation of interpreters whose language aptitudes are inappropriate to the person being interviewed.

This necessary stop system relates to unsatisfactory administrative arrangements, and to some immigration staff who, although predominantly courteous, are sometimes rude or offensive. Too often it seems to those on the receiving end that the objective is not to facilitate the right of entry laid down clearly in the immigration rules, but to find excuses for denying entry.

Let us be clear that in most cases we are talking not about those seeking to obtain settlement, but about those seeking entry as visitors. That is why the reference on the cover of the guidelines to "immigration cases" is inaccurate. Let us be clear also that we are talking about people who, according to the immigration rules, have a statutory right to enter, subject to certain conditions. On 29 October the Home Secretary referred to people and the Minister of State talked about people who sought to come to this country at the invitation of Members of Parliament

> "who do not qualify as visitors under the rules". [Official Report, 29 October 1985; Vol 84, c. 827.]

> "knowing that they had no claim to entry."

But almost all the people involved have a claim to entry because the immigration rules give them a right to enter as visitors. The problem is that that claim to entry is too often obstructed or denied by immigration officers carrying out the policy of the Minister. In the end, despite the inadequate, humiliating or offensive treatment of too many of those who arrive at the ports of entry, it is the policy that is wrong.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Kaufman: I shall not give way, as I have spoken for a long time, and am coming to the end of my speech.

The policy is based on suspicion, prejudice and paranoia. That is why we need, not obstructive guidelines, but a change of attitude and, above all, of policy. Many of the Minister's problems could be avoided if he were to change that policy. By that, I do not mean an abandonment of immigration control. Primary immigration is in any case at an end, and a Labour Government will certainly maintain firm immigration control, but unlike this Government, it will be a non-racist, non-sexist, immigration control. Even more important, in the short term, as a priority act of administrative action, the moment we take office we shall ensure——

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: No chance.

Mr. Kaufman: The hon. Gentleman will never be here to see it. He will have to grow a bit before he wins another seat.

The moment we take office we shall ensure that Labour's firm but fair immigration control will be administered humanely and with the respect that is due to those who seek to enter. There will be no discrimination whatever between those who come from Pakistan, India, and Bangladesh, and those from countries where travellers predominantly have white skins.

Because the position, which was revealed by the arguments that preceded the issue of these guidelines, is so objectionable, and because we continue to disagree with much of the content of the guidelines, we have sought this debate. We are using it to put before the country, not only our commitment to immigration control, but our absolute determination that such control shall be fair, decent, humane and, above all, non-racist, and non-sexist. Because we see none of those essential ingredients in the Government's approach and policies, we shall force a vote tonight.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): The control of the entry into the United Kingdom of people from abroad is a serious and growing problem. Nothing that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has said has done or could do anything to resolve it. I say that with regret, which is probably felt on both sides of the House. The right hon. Gentleman had the opportunity of making and, in his own words, has made, a long speech. He also had an opportunity to make recommendations which might have been of use and which we could have treated seriously, but he has chosen not to.

There are three questions that we must answer in considering the wisdom, or lack of it, in the guidelines. The first is why there has been this breathtaking increase in the number of representations on immigration cases by Members of Parliament. The increase has been breathtaking because in the three years preceding 1982 the average number of representations made was 1,000 a year. The following year the figure doubled. The year after that it trebled, and in 1985 the increase was sixfold—61 per cent. up on the previous year.

There are undoubtedly various speculative reasons why that should have happened. Obviously, one cannot attribute it to the increase in the number of Members of Parliament after the 1983 implementation of the Boundary Commission's recommendations, when there were 15 additions. That could not in any way be responsible. Nor can it be attributed to any change in the law relating to the entry of people as visitors because the Labour Government had to follow exactly the same law. There has been no change in the criteria that immigration officers apply.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): I should like to set the statistics in context. The hon. and learned Gentleman describes the whole thing as a problem. Is he aware that almost a million more people have left this country in the last 20 years than have come in? He mentioned the number of representations made by hon. Members about people who were refused entry, but has he compared the number of representations as a percentage of the number of refusals? If he does that he will find that his two, three and sixfold increases are totally wrong.

Sir Edward Gardner: The figures are before the House and can be considered. How they are interpreted is a matter for each hon. Member. I shall be surprised if any right hon. or hon. Member seeks to argue that this is not a problem of the deepest and greatest concern to all of us and to our people. It is properly described as a problem. I do not say that there should be any change in the way that the law is applied, or that the criteria used by the immigration officers should be altered to interfere with the right of access by hon. Members to the Secretary of State.

I disagree with the right hon. Member for Gorton about the recommendations in the first draft of the guidelines. He said that the draft is in some way unconstitutional and an attempt to deprive hon. Members of their right of access to the Secretary of State. It was recommended that before going to the Secretary of State an hon. Member should go directly to the port to make sure there was merit in his reference. The draft was intended not to destroy the right of access but to make sure that the right was exercised in proper cases.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall North): The hon. and learned Gentleman is the Chairman of the Select Committee on which I sit. Does he not agree that what he has said is inappropriate? In matters of housing, social security, pensions and taxation hon. Members do not act as judges. When constituents write to us or come to our surgeries we do not decide whether they are eligible for benefits, but take the matter up with officialdom. What is the difference between such cases as that and cases where people ask us to make representations about relatives or close friends who have been refused entry?

Sir Edward Gardner: First of all, these people are not constituents. I am not suggesting for one moment that the original guidelines should not have been amended in the way that they have been amended on consultation. I am submitting to the House that the right hon. Member for Gorton was wrong in intention and wrong in fact in his interpretation of the guidelines. One realises that some hon. Members would like the gates of Britain to be opened wider so that more people could come in with less difficulty. Other hon. Members would like to see the gates taken off the hinges so that there was no control of any kind. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Who?"] I hear speeches inside and outside the House and the strong impression one gets from them is exactly that which I have described to the House. No doubt speeches will be made today from which that inference could be strongly drawn.

Ms. Clare Short: By his allegations the hon. and learned Gentleman is muddling everything. We are talking about people who seek to visit our country, see their relatives and leave. We are talking about how we treat people who seek to visit our country, and not about immigration or settlement. It is important that senior hon. Members such as the hon. and learned Gentleman should not muddle the debate in this way.

Sir Edward Gardner: If the hon. Lady is muddled about my meaning, I am certainly not muddled about what I am saying and what I intend to say. I am talking about people who come here without entitlement to enter and who may not be given that entitlement. If they get in they will overstay the limit of time that we can tolerate.

Mr. Kaufman: It is important to clarify what the hon. and learned Gentleman says about whether or not people have a right to enter. The immigration rule about visitors says quite clearly:

> "A passenger seeking entry as a visitor, including one coming to stay with relatives or friends, is to be admitted"

The rule then sets out the conditions that have to be satisfied before a person is admitted. But it says that he "is to be admitted". Accordingly, he has a right of entry unless he fails to satisfy the conditions.

Sir Edward Gardner: This is the whole point: this is what we are talking about, and it is at the heart of the debate. The second question is about the effect of the increase in representations made by hon. Members about immigration cases. The first of those effects is a serious one that we must take into account. I hope that we all do. That increase diverts the energies and the concentration of immigration officers and results in appalling delays to the great majority of passengers who properly come to this country.

It is a matter of common sense that delays and a concentration of effort in the wrong places cost money, and it is ultimately the taxpayer who has to pay. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary told the House, if the system is subjected to serious strains — as undoubtedly it is at present because of the increase in representations — it is in danger of being destroyed. Most speeches in the debate will be directed towards how the Government should deal with this problem. In cases where an application is made for a stop on a decision by an immigration officer, and where that application is by way of reference to the Secretary of State, I should like to see some means of distinguishing between cases which have merit and cases which have no merit.

Mr. John Whitfield (Dewsbury): My hon. and learned Friend's point is apposite to the debate. How on earth can any such distinction be made—and such a distinction ought to be made—if hon. Members are not required to speak to the immigration officer at the port of entry?

Sir Edward Gardner: I take that point. It is one for which I have a great deal of sympathy. Other hon. Members might also feel sympathy for it. Because of my great anxiety I have looked very carefully at the guidelines. The last thing that one wants to do is to give the impression to anyone, in this House, in this country or abroad, that we are in any way offending against this country's reputation, for fairness in matters of this kind. I recommend the guidelines to the House as being reasonable, sensible and well balanced. If they are followed, as one hopes they will be, we shall be able to increase the efficiency of the system and cut down the delays.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Edward Gardner: No.

They will be a means of preserving the reputation of this nation for fairness.

5 pm

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): It is fairly well known that there is a considerable number of people from the Indian sub-continent in my constituency. The Home Office and the Minister of State, the hon. and learned Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington), know that I deal with a large number of cases on a day-to-day basis, including Sundays, and sometimes Christmas day and Boxing day, that involve hold-ups at Heathrow airport. Therefore I have considerable experience of this matter. It may come as a surprise to some hon. Members that I did not receive a letter of admonishment from the Minister of State. I have had my leg pulled about that; some of my hon. Friends suggested that I must be slipping.

When I deal with cases that involve another constituency I am always most careful to ensure that a link of some kind can be found with my constituency. Hon. Members who represent other constituencies may not always be as readily available as I, or my wife, may be. My home is near Heathrow airport and my constituency is also close to that airport. There are occasions, therefore, when people in Birmingham, Glasgow, Gravesend or elsewhere, including the adjacent constituency of Hayes and Harlington, do not get the immediate response that is needed when a passenger is required to return to his country of origin in a matter of two or three days.

A passenger is sometimes detained because of an hon. Member's intervention. Then he has to await the heavily weighted decision of the Minister of State, Home Office. If the Minister of State wishes to ease the burden on the Home Office, he ought to consider introducing a more realistic period of consultation with hon. Members who are snowed under with these cases. It might then be possible to lighten the burdens of the whole system, including those of hon. Members and the Home Office. I invite the Home Secretary to consider that point.

I have already suggested that one means of lightening the burden would be to consider the reasons given by immigration control for the refusal of leave to enter this country. We should comb through those cases with meticulous care to find out how frequently flimsy grounds for refusal of leave to enter this country have been given. Sometimes it is said that the hosts or the incoming passengers have lied, because a discrepancy has been discovered between the amount of time for which passengers have asked for leave to visit this country and the amount of time for which hosts have asked to welcome their relatives. Although the Home Secretary is not in his place, I hope that when he reads Hansard he will pay some regard to my remarks.

The occasions are rare upon which incoming passengers or their hosts set out to circumvent immigration control. There are such occasions, of course, but during the many years that I have been Member of Parliament for Ealing, Southall, few people who have entered the United Kingdom as visitors have absconded and gone adrift. There may have been two or three such cases during the 20 years that I have been a Member of this House. Visitors to this country would be miracle men if they could understand our immigration laws and rules. Very few of the indigenous people understand all their ramifications.

I hope that the public will understand that in this debate we are not discussing basic immigration: or large numbers of people arriving at Heathrow airport and other airports who hope to settle illegally in Britain by means of subterfuge.

I am grateful for the continuous courtesy and co-operation of the immigration staff in the Minister's office. They are not responsible for the system or for policy. The Government are responsible for the system and for the harshness, in many cases, of the way in which visitors from abroad, particularly from the Indian sub-continent, are treated. In some cases they travel with a letter from, perhaps, auntie who says, "When you arrive I want to introduce you to a nice girl who is a British passport holder." But that is what makes the world go round. Young men from this country have gone to the four corners of the world looking for and finding brides. Those who go abroad on holiday sometimes accomplish the same task. That should not be held against visitors to this country. Furthermore, the host community knows that a limit is placed upon the length of these visits. They fill in forms as sponsors.

Unlike the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler) I do not send out circular letters. I notice that he is shaking his head. I understand that he gives a great deal of assistance to the immigrant community in Bradford, North and he is to be commended for doing so. However, although people queue up at my surgery to express apprehension about the way in which their relatives will be treated when they arrive at Heathrow airport, their apprehension sometimes proves to have been unnecessary because I hear little about it afterwards. I assume, therefore, that the visitors enter this country without too much difficulty and that as they motor away from Heathrow airport they can see that brilliant sign which says "Welcome to Britain".

However, some visitors are not so welcome to Britain. In those cases, I say that if there is time they should write to me. If there is time, I respond in writing and set out the duties of immigration control. I tell them that, if all the details that they have given me are the absolute truth, there should be no difficulty about granting admittance for a legitimate visit.

The importance of people being granted what I call a legitimate visit rather than temporary admission, which hon. Members achieve as a result of our intervention, is that, if they are granted temporary admission, a mark is put in their passport. This means that, if they want to visit another European country, they will not be granted a visa. Furthermore, they will not be granted a visa to visit Canada if they have relatives in that country.

I could make a long speech, but I do not intend to do so. However, I wish to make one or two points which may help the Minister of State and the control system. I have already pleaded for a meticulous look at the reasons given for refusal. They will eventually be given by Ministers to Members of Parliament who intervene.

When I encountered the Minister in the Lobby he would say that he was fed up writing "Dear Sydney", so I suggested a compromise whereby I would write "Dear D." and he would write "Dear S", as that might relieve the tension on his wrist.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes) rose——

Mr. Bidwell: I would like to get this off my chest; I will give way later.

I understand from a former Minister of State that the present Minister of State, Home Office, is probably the most overworked and overburdened Minister in the Government. I defy him to say that he can consider, with meticulous care, the mounting number of cases which we are bringing before him. That validates the plea made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) when he presented to the House, without opposition, a Bill to provide for an appeal system before the departure of the passenger.

It worries me that it is possible for a passenger stuck in Harmondsworth or another detention centre to be there for up to three weeks. There is one passenger who is presently detained about whom I am most anxious. I am told that a reply is pending, as the draft is before the Minister of State. I am depressed because I have to talk to the relatives of that person and try to justify the fact that someone can be stuck in such a detention centre for three weeks or more before the ultimate decision comes into force.

It is rare for the Minister to overturn the immigration control attitudes. I suggest to the Minister and his officials who are listening to this debate that there is a great deal of leeway within the present system and that those responsible for immigration control should be encouraged to reconsider whether they have a solid case, which would be upheld by public opinion, for refusing passengers admission. It is not a question of discrepancies which may sometimes arise because a travel agent has advised a passenger to tell certain lies on arriving at the port. We could do a good deal to lighten the Minister's burden, and it would lighten mine as well. I would be delighted if that was the case.

I have intervened in other cases. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has pointed out, we are reluctant to canvass cases in other Member's constituencies. However, sometimes the constituency Member, for various reasons—I am not calling them racist, although there is one particular case who would take that label—has been embroiled in long-standing immigration cases. Community relations officers—I will not name the places but I would name them later if necessary—will inevitably approach friends in other constituencies if they are dealing with a temporary admission.

Immigration officers often advise hosts and friends when a passenger has entered a two-day temporary admission. If the Member intervenes, the admission may be extended to a couple of months or more. The passenger will be invited to appeal if he is refused leave to enter but he may not do so, often because of expense. Therefore, he does not achieve the stay for which he asked. That has its own logic. The visitors do not run away. That is very rare; in my long experience, there have been perhaps two or three cases. They do not abscond, as the Minister calls it.

Mr. Hanley: Few hon. Members are treated with such universal respect in this matter as the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell). I ask for one word of advice. When the hon. Gentleman meets constituents who are anxious about whether their friends or relatives will be allowed into the country as visitors, does he ever advise them to seek voluntary entry clearance in the home country before they depart?

Mr. Bidwell: I was considering that before I started my speech today. However, there are difficulties. I have asked the Minister's office for advice. Why do we not introduce a universal entry certificate requirment? Why do we not ask for visas? I am not pleading for such a system. Our relationship with Indian sub-continent, the to-ing and fro-ing of business men, makes it difficult. Let us consider visits.

The founders of the Southall community were those who left Jullundur to avoid being cheap labour. From the inception of that community in Southall we fought to get them trade union rights. The constituency of the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) is not far from mine. He has visited my constituency on occasion in tragic circumstances. I value his visits, as they show a non-party approach to problems. I have always made a non-party approach to solving the problem of immigration, and in that sense the hon. Gentleman's remarks about my attitudes being acceptable across the House are correct. I have never regarded immigration as a matter that we should thrust into a party political collision. The non-party approach is necessary in the struggle for racial harmony, but I shall justify it another time.

We are not discussing the broader issues of immigration. Practicalities do not promote the idea that one should be able to obtain an entry certificate. If people flew from Jullundur or came overnight to Delhi they might spend two or three days in Delhi. The delay in Delhi is due to lack of staff to deal with entry to Britain. This could be avoided by a great extension of the staff in Delhi or Bombay, but the Home Office is not willing to promote that. If the Home Office were to insist on an entry certificate, there would have to be a considerable increase in staff to cut the abominable delays. It must also increase the staff in the pocket areas of migration in the Indian sub-continent — Bangladesh, Sylhet, Assam, Bombay, Islamabad, Jullundur, Amritsar, Delhi—those pockets of migration which affect Bradford and my constituency.

Visitors may be asked to obtain an entry certificate, but one realises how difficult that may be. People may make the long journey to Delhi and then be refused. I have seen such problems for myself when I have visited India over a number of years.

People have sought asylum because of the difficulties in the Sikh community, the recent attack on the Golden Temple and the assassination of the Indian Prime Minister, Mrs. Gandhi. Presumably the guidelines do not apply to Member's representations in respect of asylum seekers. Such applications are automatically referred to the Home Office by the immigration services. However, I should like this clarified when the Minister replies.

Because of subsequent reactions to the guidelines, the Home Secretary has back-pedalled on the substance of Members' rights. I thought he would do so, because he must understand that Members are jealous of their rights. I asked about this matter years ago, when I first came to the House. I asked about taking up the grievances and problems which affected other constituencies. I was given a ruling—not a fundamental ruling—that it was a matter of convention and courtesy. It is difficult to follow these courtesies; one often does not have the time to do so, and it must be a belated action.

One certainly does not wish to jump in and deal with matters in neighbouring constituencies. We know that some Tories have an abominable attitude and will not help Asian people as they would help non-Asian people. I think that it is valid to mention that the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) has even dared to complain about my taking up cases affecting his constituency. The Asian people concerned, however, who have friends a stone's throw over the border between the hon. Gentleman's constituency and mine, say that it is useless approaching him because he has made it clear publicly that he will not touch them with a barge pole. That being so, the only way for them to achieve the second look at that matter afforded by the present system is by coming to the Member in whose constituency they have friends and relatives.

Mr. John Carlisle: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I must protest strongly on behalf of my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), who clearly had no warning of the allegations that have been made. The hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) should withdraw those comments unless he has already cleared the matter with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): This is a matter for debate, but if an hon. Member intends to refer to another hon. Member, it is customary for him to give notice to that Member.

Mr. Bidwell: Given the overspill of Asian people into Hayes and Harlington, it is difficult for me to explain the circumstances in which I am placed. The hon. Gentleman is the architect of his own misfortune. He told me that he was complaining to the Minister about my intervention, and I want the whole world to know that. I retain a friendly attitude to him if I can, so I told him that he must be suffering from a death wish because with that attitude to a substantial proportion of his constituents he could not hope to survive the next election.

Mr. Tim Brinton (Gravesham): The hon. Gentleman has also alluded to my constituency. He recently had a meeting with my community relations council which led to publicity in the local paper to the effect that he was prepared to take on cases in which I refused to intervene. I am perfectly convinced that the hon. Gentleman is good-hearted in his approach, but he has also said that in his view this privilege for Members should be decided by Members themselves. Will he tell the House whether he has ever refused to intervene in a case brought to him and, if so, what would be the reasons for such a refusal? I shall then better understand his approach to the problem.

Mr. Bidwell: I have frequently refused, when I did not think that the case was powerful enough. For instance, when a person has been told to leave at a particular time, there may be special pleading from the Gravesend community relations council. The essence of the matter is that if a Member of Parliament, even one who I understand is not contesting the next election — [HON. MEMBERS: "What has that to do with it?"] It has a lot to do with it. If a Member of Parliament is held to be failing his constituents in some way it is perfectly valid for them to go to another Member of Parliament who is willing to take the matter up.

In conclusion, I re-emphasise my plea to the Minister to ease the burdens that neither of us wants by looking more carefully at the reasons advanced, especially with regard to visits. Much of the difficulty would then vanish. Better still, he should examine the feasibility of the proposals by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West for an appeal system. That suggestion is validated by the proposals made when the Immigration Act 1971, which I opposed, was being put together. If the Minister took that proposal on board, he could get on with his other duties and pay more attention to fighting the crime wave instead of being involved in the detail of these cases.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): First, I pay a warm tribute to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State for the admirable way in which he and his staff deal with representations made by hon. Members. There can be little doubt that he has one of the most exacting jobs in the Government and that he does it with distinction. He is always fair, courteous and accessible, he takes enormous trouble to consider every case and he is ready to look again when Members ask him to do so. Perhaps it has been the efficient way in which my hon. and learned Friend and his predecessors of both political parties have dealt with these matters which has led over the years to the gradual increase in representations by Members of Parliament in immigration cases. The immigrants themselves, the visitors to this country, their representatives and organisations in this country know about the procedure and that in itself may generate more inquiries of hon. Members and thus more representation. It may also be due to the way in which Members themselves deal so assiduously with the cases that they raise.

I thought that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) was perhaps rather ungenerous in his remarks today. He said that I did not go out of my way to assist my constituents. I hope that on reflection he will withdraw that statement. I regularly assist my constituents, as do nearly all hon. Members I know who represent constituencies surrounding Heathrow, one of whom is the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell).

Ms. Clare Short: I think that my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who is no longer present, was intending to make a witty remark. He had no evidence, such as copies of letters, to suggest that the hon. Gentleman went out of his way to assist constituents, but there was no suggestion that the hon. Gentleman did not give adequate service to his constituents.

Mr. Shersby: That kind of humour is lost on me. If the right hon. Gentleman chooses to employ it and then to be absent when I reply to it, he has only himself to blame.

Mr. Bidwell: I acknowledge the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) as my Member for Parliament, as I live in his constituency. No occasion has ever been mentioned to me—had there been such an occasion, I am sure that it would have been mentioned to me—on which the hon. Gentleman has not been most helpful to those who come to see him.

Mr. Shersby: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Shersby: I will not give way again, as I wish to get on.

I thought that the right hon. Member for Gorton made a wily, carping speech designed to curry favour with the ethnic minority communities. He quoted various cases, one of which he had raised with the Prime Minister, to justify a major attack on the rules, but he said nothing about the thousands of visitors who come in without difficulty or the many cases in which, following the intervention of Members of Parliament, the people concerned are admitted swiftly and courteously and made welcome to our country. I believe that the right hon. Gentleman's speech will upset and disturb many immigration officers who are my constituents.

An important aspect of today's debate is the substantial increase in the number of cases raised by Members of Parliament. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary spoke of a 61 per cent. increase since 1984. That must be a matter of concern to the Home Office. It is also a matter of concern to me and to other Members representing constituencies around Heathrow and other ports of entry because it entails the diversion of officers from their work at the control points and slows down clearance of the majority of passengers who are eligible for admission.

Each time I return to Heathrow I look carefully at the queues of passengers and spend a few minutes seeing how long it takes to get through the barriers. I compare my experience at Heathrow with my experience overseas. In general people trying to visit this country can enter swiftly and without undue difficulty. When I compare Heathrow with some overseas airports, I think we are very fortunate. I pay tribute to the officers who act fairly and courteously and who at all times attempt to help people, whatever the hour of the day or night. I am sure I speak for the whole House when I say that we want visitors at Heathrow to enter the country quickly and courteously.

Because of the tremendous pressure being exerted on the Home Office, it is right that the House should be asked to review the procedures. While hon. Members wish to retain their undoubted right to make representations to the Minister of State, surely there must be a sensible balance between that right and the need to maintain efficient and effective immigration control. That control has to be exercised in accordance with the Immigration Act 1971, an Act supported by most people in Britain. I want to see it continue to work well.

Cases which last for many months and in which a visitor is not removed within two months of arrival result in the eventual cost of removal being passed to the taxpayer. That does not help to maintain good community relations. I am concerned that a system which has generally worked well, as several hon. Members have said, is at risk. If the House does not take account of the serious strain on the Home Office the system will become unworkable.

What would be the alternative if we did not have the system of representation by Members of Parliament and the stop facility? The only alternative would be that immigrants refused entry would have to be removed, as the original Act intended. Many hon. Members with large immigrant communities will agree that such a change would not be welcomed either by the House or by their constituents. Therefore, I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has given thought to the new guidelines setting out the practice to be followed by hon. Members in normal immigration cases. I for one welcome the consultation which my hon. and learned Friend has undertaken and the willingness he has displayed at all times to make changes in the original guidelines as published following the consultations.

I also welcome my hon. and learned Friend's understanding of the fact that a requirement to the port of entry would place a great and unacceptable burden on an hon. Member. Swift access to the private office of my hon. and learned Friend is essential if we are to do our job as hon. Members. I am also glad that my hon. and learned Friend recognises that in many cases hon. Members would still feel obliged to put a stop notice on removal, whatever facts were presented by the immigration officer. It is right that the requirement to refer cases to the ports has been omitted from the new guidelines.

I want to comment on several important aspects of the revised guidelines. I welcome the definition of the role of hon. Members. That is most useful and I hope my hon. and learned Friend will draw it to the attention of new Members of the House when they are elected. Casting my mind back some 13½ years, I cannot recall receiving any guidelines from the Home Secretary of the day in 1972 as to how I should deal with immigration matters in Uxbridge. I was left to find out by experience, as most hon. Members are. Fortunately, I was able to draw on extensive local government experience. Without that, I might have been in difficulty. I hope my hon. and learned Friend will ensure that when new Members enter the House they will automatically receive the guidelines.

It is right that only the constituency Member should take up a case unless, because of illness or absence, another hon. Member has been requested to deal with his or her constituency business. I am pleased that the guidelines state that hon. Members with a special interest in the problems of a particular national group who wish to raise an immigration case must first consult the constituency Member concerned. If we depart from the long-standing and established convention of the House we shall only get into difficulty. The convention which exists commends itself to most hon. Members. The constituency Member has the absolute right to act for his constituents and that right should never be abused by another hon. Member who claims a special interest in a national group.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Does the House realise that if we pass the rules tonight, as I hope we shall——

Ms. Clare Short: We are not voting on the rules but on the Adjournment.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: Whether or not there is a vote on the Adjournment, there is virtual acceptance by the House of the guidelines. Does my hon. Friend realise that the convention, which we ought to keep, will become rather more than a convention, because it will be laid down in the guidelines and, therefore, will apply?

Mr. Shersby: I take the point that my hon. Friend has raised. I think the guidelines make it clear that it is a convention. The guidelines, which are not rules, emphasise the convention which we all understand.

I also welcome the emphasis that is placed on the fact that temporary admission of a visitor is not a grant of leave to enter, but an alternative to detention. If that point could be made more widely known, it would be of advantage to all concerned. In fairness to visitors and to our constituents, it must be clearly understood that those who become engaged or who marry while on temporary admission are ineligible to stay on the basis of that engagement or marriage. I am sure the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall will agree that many of the problems we have to deal with involve people who become engaged or who marry while in the United Kingdom on temporary admission and who expect to stay here.

There are enormous problems when an hon. Member who wishes to help, very often a young couple, has to tell them what the position is. It is vital for would-be immigrants to know that the immigration rules require them to get entry clearance from abroad. It would be much easier if that were done. The hon. Member for Ealing, Southall made the point that there are not sufficient staff in our embassies and high commissions abroad to make that possible. My hon. and learned Friend might like to comment on that when he is replying to the debate.

During consultation on the guidelines there has been discussion about the fact that they will prevent hon. Members from intimating to relatives that, should a passenger get into difficulty, he or she may seek the advice of a Member of Parliament. I am sure that that was never intended. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made clear in his speech, the intention was to point to the undesirability of the practice of inviting people to come to this country to seek entry, knowing that they had no entitlement to come. I wonder how often that has happened. New Members of Parliament should be advised on that point and they should realise that if they provide letters giving the impression that people have an entitlement to come here, they will create great difficulties.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): How is an hon. Member in any party to know whether someone from overseas, whether from Bangladesh or the United States, has a right to come here as a visitor, which is what we are talking about?

Mr. Shersby: I do not think it is for an hon. Member to make that judgment; it is for the officer at the port of entry to make the judgment. If hon. Members take it upon themselves to give such advice they may get into difficulty. I very much welcome paragraph 19 of the guidelines, which makes it clear that if that happens, temporary admission will not be granted readily. That is quite clear, and we all know where we stand. I welcome that guideline and hope that it will be supported throughout the House.

I am also glad that my hon. and learned Friend has extended the deadline for written representations from 10 to 12 working days. This change will be welcomed by all hon. Members. The right hon. Member for Gorton mentioned the real problems involved in contacting hon. Members at weekends. We all have other obligations at weekends, not only to our constituents but to our families, and it is not always easy to contact us. I wonder whether my hon. and learned Friend would be willing to consider the possibility of allowing several clear working days to elapse, so that a visitor wishing to make representations to an hon. Member would be able to do so during a working day rather than at a weekend.

Even if they are not perfect, the revised guidelines are firm and pretty fair. I hope that all hon. Members will help to make them work. If they work, we shall all be better able to serve the interests of our constituents and of those who wish to visit our country.

5.42 pm

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I should like first to associate myself with the comments made about the helpfulness of the Minister's private office in these matters. I, too, have found it to be unfailingly helpful. I genuinely sympathise with the Minister of State. His job must be one of the most unpleasant tasks in the Government, and I do not believe that it is lightly carried out. The problems are problems of principle, concerning our attitude towards immigration and towards minorities, rather than of implementation by the Minister.

I accept that there are a few who wish to circumvent the rules by coming here as visitors. However, the evidence available to me and my colleagues suggests that such people form a tiny proportion of the total and that the communities themselves are aware of the damage done to their general case if people seek to circumvent the rules.

Such incidents are indicative of the desperate circumstances that people face in other countries, but that is another matter.

A Government's political attitude must influence administrative actions. If a Government support right and principled attitudes by guidelines and the force of law, that will without a doubt influence the actions of immigration and entry clearance officers. I do not doubt that the Government's general attitude towards immigration is unsympathetic and that that transmits itself to the officials who have to implement the policy.

We all have stories about how people are affected in practice. One story was told to me by a white constituent who was, I suspect, not generally sympathetic to the idea of people from ethnic groups coming to this country. He told me that he had returned from a trip to Amsterdam on a plane carrying a large group of white people who were openly talking about the drugs that they had used in Amsterdam and had brought back with them. Apparently, they were smoking pot on the plane. At Heathrow all those people went straight through the immigration controls. The one Asian couple on the plane, however, were immediately stopped by immigration and subjected to the procedure. Such incidents have a bad influence on people in our own communities, and show that there is some discrimination in the way in which we treat people.

We need to work on our individual cases within the Government's overall philosophy. Although I want to replace the Government as soon as possible by people of a different philosophy, I should attempt to do as well as I can for my constituents within the rules. Hon. Members gain nothing by acting irresponsibly on these cases. We must build up an acceptance of the impartiality and responsibility of individual hon. Members, whatever our individual opinions may be on Government policy.

It is not always easy to tell the communities that one represents——

Mr. Corbyn: I think that I heard the hon. Gentleman say that he did not condone hon. Members acting irresponsibly on immigration matters. So far as I know, the only person who has claimed that hon. Members act irresponsibly is the Minister of State. Are we to understand that the Liberal spokesman agrees with the remarks made by the Minister of State when he started this ridiculous charade?

Mr. Meadowcroft: That is not a helpful intervention. What I was referring to was the macho symbolism of some hon. Members who are delighted to appear on the list of 23 and who believe that that has helped them to gain reselection. But that attitude is not helpful to the cases that they are trying to represent.

Sometimes we have to try to tell people in our own communities that there are reason why a certain person should not be admitted. I remember the Minister of State telling me categorically that the person concerned in a certain case was involved—at a time of high stress—with the Khalistan movement. I had to tell the Sikh representatives in Leeds that, as far as I was aware—the Minister had given me his word—that person was so involved and his admission as a visitor would not be helpful at that moment. The community accepted that because in other—admittedly rare—cases we had been able to achieve a change in the Minister's policy. Such a relationship will be difficult to build up under the rules put before us today.

Essentially, the system that we are trying to operate cannot cope with the numbers of people involved, and we are therefore faced with the problem of putting bureaucratic regulations in place of a real policy. It is not only immigration officers who are taken off other work. Hon. Members who would dearly love to be able to make progress with other work find themselves diverted towards urgent and complicated cases involving people stopped at the point of entry and appeals from relatives or friends to the hon. Member for ways and means of securing entry. All too often, prima facie, the person should never have been stopped.

We are dealing with ordinary people from ordinary families who are trying to come here for a visit and are stopped at the point of entry on a technicality. They, and I, are baffled as to why that happens. I am distressed by the impression that is given to many ordinary families in this country, especially in the Asian community, by the type of bureaucracy that is encountered on entry to this country.

The Minister of State should openly recognise the fact that temporary admission is another category of immigration or entry. It is used by the Minister as much as by hon. Members as a way of securing entry, in effect on bail, and as a way of retaining people's passports. That is the crucial point. If someone is given leave to enter, there is no way in which his passport should be retained.

Mr. Madden: It would be unfortunate if the hon. Gentleman were to mislead our constituents by seeking to give the impression that it is lawful to retain the passports of those on temporary admission. The Minister of State and his officials have, on a number of occasions, assured hon. Members that if passports are requested they will be immediately returned.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I am well aware of that, but the corollary is that if one insists that the passport is returned, that is an encouragement to the Minister to say that there are no grounds for allowing the person to enter. If one insists, it is easier to say no than to allow them to retain the passport, in which case they may say yes. If one is endeavouring to secure permission for someone to stay in this country for a relatively short period, one has to accept —whether or not it is legal—that the passport will be retained. That is yet another guarantee for the Home Office. I do not say that that is right; I say that it is what happens.

Mr. Madden rose——

Mr. Meadowcroft: One of the problems faced by the Minister—it is a problem that he should take far more clearly on board—is that of the clash of cultures as it affects what is said by people coming into this country when they are interviewed separately. In many of the cases that we face, hon. Members have to explain what is meant by what people say when they come in.

Let me give three examples. Recently, a visitor to one of my constituents had a letter from her sponsor advising what to say and what not to say in particular circumstances. As far as I could make out, there was no suggestion that the sponsor was advising the visitor to tell untruths or misrepresent the facts. The letter simply explained what it was beneficial to emphasise in order to cope with the particular inquiries that would be made. That was held to be a reason why the visitor should not be admitted. That is ridiculous. The visitor was euphemistically described as somebody of modest background. In other words, she was somebody who would find it difficult to communicate in a bureaucratic situation. The sponsor was only being helpful, but that boomeranged. That was the result of a clash of cultures and what happened was unforgivable.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that if only we could get people to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth most of our problems at the airports would disappear?

Mr. Meadowcroft: I wish that that were the case, but I have examples of people telling the truth, particularly when a question was put in a negative way, when often the response from a person who comes from India or Pakistan——

Mr. Corbyn: There are racist immigration officers.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: When accusations of racism are made from a sedentary position, that is a disgraceful abuse.

Mr. Meadowcroft: people are sometimes asked questions in a way that causes them to respond in a way that does not help their case, even if they are telling the truth. Sometimes the problem stems purely from a clash of cultures.

A man whose sponsor was his brother was asked by an immigration officer if his brother wrote to him. He replied that he wrote to him once a month. The brother, his sponsor, was asked whether he wrote to his brother, and he said that he did not. The letters were going to the head of the family in India—the mother—who passed the letters on to the other members of the family. Both men told the truth, but the visitor's answer was detrimental to his chance of being admitted.

An older Muslim woman is often, sadly, regarded as being in a somewhat shameful position if she is not married. Long delays in the cases of fiancés and husbands entering Britain are detrimental to the woman's standing in the community. Sometimes cases are not dealt with in rotation and a person can be a figure of fun in the community because other partners have come in who may have applied later.

Members of Parliament are not being approached by excessive numbers of people. It appears to be one in five. Sometimes, because of the problems, hon. Members are asked to provide letters in advance. In effect, they are testimonials of the sponsors in Britain which can be taken to the airport to show that they are people of standing in case there are problems. Sometimes I resent the extra work load which often proves to be unnecessary because people's fears are unrealised. We should not have to go to extra trouble simply because people are fearful that they will not be treated fairly when they enter the country.

The new guidelines are better than the old, but they are not satisfactory. They are wrong in principle because they seek to instruct and to limit hon. Members in the carrying out of their duties on behalf of their constituents. If that precedent were accepted it might reappear in guidelines on the way in which we represent our constituents in cases concerning the Department of Health and Social Security, the Inland Revenue, and so on. Hon. Members should realise that if they give ground on this simply because the Home Office has had a problem, they are laying themselves open to new areas of control. That is an extremely dangerous principle and precedent, and we should oppose the guidelines on that ground. In effect, the guidelines are a bureaucratic answer to a problem of principle which should be dealt with as such.

The problem of the time gap and whether the person to be approached is the immigration officer or somebody else has already been mentioned so I want to concentrate on constituency links. Another cultural problem is that, however distant, the many members of a visitor's family often regard themselves as one family. It will be difficult for the Minister to determine who is the appropriate Member of Parliament. The family will often have representatives in a number of constituencies and the number of constituencies concerned could probably be counted as the number of hon. Members in the House at the moment.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North) rose——

Mr. Meadowcroft: I will not give way because I am anxious to allow the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members to speak in the debate.

If the Minister tries to limit the right to make an application to the sponsor's Member of Parliament, the families will pick the sponsor from the constituency with the most amenable Member of Parliament. The problem will not be solved. The bureaucratic nonsense will simply be shifted further on. We should consider the circumstances rather than limiting the choice of hon. Member.

Some hon. Members take the view that because the immigration officer looks at the case, he or she has made an appropriate decision, with which the Member does not want to interfere. I doubt whether the same Members would accept such a decision if it was made by the DHSS or the Inland Revenue if a constituent was complaining about his or her treatment. In such cases a Member would look into the matter with an attitude far different than if it were an immigration case.

Our task is surely to assist constituents to express themselves more fully or to discover the reasons for a decision. That is not just my opinion; it is also the opinion of the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer), with whose views I doubt whether I would agree on virtually anything else. On 29 October he made the extremely valid point that "it is not the function of any hon. Member to act as judge and jury in deciding whether or not an individual should be allowed entry, but only to make responsible and proper representations to the Home Office".—[Official Report, 29 October 1985; Vol. 84, c. 834.]

That is exactly the case. The guidelines will not assist the hon. and learned Gentleman nor me to do that job, so they should be opposed whenever possible.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that the 10-minute limit on speeches will operate from 6 pm, and I appeal for the co-operation of hon. Members.

5.57 pm

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): I agree with some of what the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) said, but it seemed to me that the Liberal party policy is very much one of doing away with controls over visitors. That would lead to a great deal of trouble. If people could enter Britain with almost no checks, we would soon have a strong flow of immigrants.

Like several other hon. Members, I want to pay tribute to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State. He always shows great courtesy in the way that he handles these cases. He is firm but fair. He has done an excellent job and I hope that he will go on doing it for a long time. He gets a good deal of trouble from me, because I am one of those who regularly corresponds with him, as, I suspect, most hon. Members in the Chamber this afternoon do as well because we have a large number of immigrants in our constituencies. I have about 7,000 people from the Sikh community and they have many relatives and friends who wish to visit them here for holidays and for family celebrations. I always do the best that I can to assist them when they have a genuine case.

I agree that we are not judge and jury. It is extremely difficult for us to make our minds up, but we should apply some criteria when we receive applications. I try to encourage a leading member or members of the ethnic minority community to introduce Mr. or Mrs. Y and to give me the reasons for an application. I submit that to my hon. and learned Friend and usually he allows the visitor to come for a short time and that is good. But where there is a strong suspicion that a person is trying to evade the system, it is an hon. Member's duty, perhaps not to be judge and jury, but to say that in such circumstances he will not be a party to the attempt. Otherwise, he is just a rubber stamp. That would be quite wrong.

I did not know that some hon. Members refused to handle such cases. I would not do that, even if I had only a handful of immigrants living in my constituency. After all, such people have every right to come here as visitors so long as they are genuine. However, the cases must be carefully considered. In recent times, in particular, some of the replies that I have received from my hon. and learned Friend have shown that the immigration officer who perhaps turned down the request had very convincing reasons for believing that the person had no entitlement to enter the country.

Those who are entitled to come here temporarily, or on a permanent basis have nothing to fear from the system. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has said, the rules have not changed. However, those who have an illegal purpose in mind and who are trying to trick their way into the country must be stopped by any Government in the interests of the majority of people in this country.

We would be mad to have an open-door policy. This country has a large ethnic population, and we must have sensible and strict controls. It is very much in the interest of British residents with an ethnic minority background that the rules should be properly applied and that their relatives should know that they are allowed to enter the country temporarily for a family celebration or holiday.

I know that there is no chance of my next idea being pursued immediately, but I believe that it is worth exploring the possibility of a visa system. In some ways, I wonder why the Home Office has not considered it before for all Commonwealth and foreign visitors. I mean all foreign and Commonwealth visitors; not just the black or coloured ones, but the white ones as well.

I am very conscious of the fact that I need a visa to go to India, Australia or the United States. There is quite a rigmarole before one can obtain such visas. I am fortunate in that, like many other hon. Members, my American visa is indefinite. Nevertheless, it has to be obtained, and renewed from time to time. Many countries that have had some sort of association with us in the past demand visas.

I believe that the Home Office should consider a visa system because it would regulate our intake from other countries. Those entitled to come to Britain would be able to do so without too much difficulty, and there would not be the alleged discrimination — which I do not necessarily believe takes place — between those who happen to be black and those who happen to be white. It is said that those who are black are given rather a hard time when going through the immigration procedures.

An alternative to a visa might be a bond or guarantee given by the person who would be responsible for accommodating the visitor. It may well be the brother, sister, or even the mother and father. A leading member of my local Sikh community, who is also, I am glad to say, a Conservative councillor, is very helpful to me in such matters. He wondered why the Home Office did not suggest that the guarantor should sign a document, swear an affidavit or put up a bond. The guarantor could say that Mr. X or Mr. Y was entering Britain and that he would guarantee that Mr. X or Mr. Y would return at the end of his holiday. The guarantor would then forfeit his bond if the visitor decamped.

I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister will accept that many of these people are very responsible. Hon. Members will know, as I do, of cases where the visitors have vanished. When that happened in my area recently, there was great ill feeling among those who had been responsible for recommending the man to me. They felt guilty, and have made every effort since to trace the miscreant.

The role of the Member of Parliament is essential when it comes to making a stop plea to the Home Office. It is said that sometimes the matter is not followed up, and that, having obtained a stop, the Member of Parliament has not written to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister asking permission for the person to stay. That represents a great abuse, and whoever has done it is wrong and has failed in his duty.

I do not take kindly to other hon. Members coming into my territory, particularly on such matters. I have had two such cases, but only one, I am glad to say, where I felt that the person was intruding. In the other case, the Member was courteous enough to write to me and I allowed the case to go through. But I would feel affronted if there was a string of such cases, and I believe that it would bring the whole business into disrepute if immigrants who might be refused entry were touted around from constituency to constituency by Members of Parliament who felt that there was some need to do it. It is essentially the role of the Member of Parliament in the area to be visited to shoulder at least some of the responsibility.

Despite all the criticisms that have been made, I believe that the system is good, although it provides a good deal of work and difficulty for the Member of Parliament and for the immigration service. Recently, my hon. and learned Friend the Minister told me quite sharply about a visitor who did not go back. I believe that he should come down sharply on all of us and let us know when someone has not kept to the terms of his admittance. There should then be a responsibility on the Member of Parliament to go back to whoever guaranteed that person as a genuine visitor.

[Sir Dudley Smith]

I deplore the remarks of the right hon. member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) about immigration officers. They have a difficult and trying job. There may be bad apples among them, as there are in every walk of life, but my experience is that they are courteous, dedicated and very skilled. No cause is advanced by such an attack, especially when it comes from a right hon. Member of his standing.

We need better co-operation from the local community just as we need the continued and firm approach of my hon. and learned Friend the Minister. I am very satisfied with what he is doing. He is doing it in the interests of the country as a whole, and I can certainly commend this document.

6.8 pm

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has restated the history of this dispute. Some wild and unsubstantiated allegations have been made by the Minister of State against unnamed Members of Parliament. He produced a potential list of names, which was no doubt drawn up for his own purposes. When he produced it, he did not claim that it included every hon. Member who was guilty of one of the six so-called abuses that he mentioned in his letter.

I shall outline two cases that the Minister of State told me represented abuses. I do not apologise in any way for anything that I did in either case. Hon. Members should know the sort of thing that the Minister calls an abuse and should know what he expects us to do to our constituents. The first concerns a girl called Baljit Kaur, whose case I have raised on the Adjournment before. She was born in Birmingham and grew up there. With her mother, she visited India to see her granny who was getting old. The family had agreed that if she met anyone she liked, she could consider marrying. She did, indeed, meet someone she liked, and she married him. In the Asian community a new sort of marriage is evolving that lies somewhere between the traditional arranged marriage and our traditional love marriage. She found a young man she liked and they married in India so that her granny could be there.

Baljit stayed with her husband in India hoping that he would get his visa and that they would return to Birmingham together. She became pregnant and returned home to Birmingham to get proper medical care. Having been born in Birmingham, she found that she did not have the immunities that the people who grew up in the village in India had, and she tended to get sickness, which was bad for her pregnancy. She came to ask me to help hurry the arrival of her husband so that he could be with her before the baby was born. That was my initial involvement in the case. I wrote to the Minister and he wrote back saying that the fact that someone was pregnant was not a reason to bring forward an interview.

Eventually the baby was born—it was a lovely little girl—and the husband was desperate to come and see his daughter. He had his interview and was refused. The couple were devastated, as was I, because this was my first experience of a primary purpose case. I went to see the Minister on a number of occasions. I explained to my constituent, Baljit, that she would have a right to bring her husband here as a visitor, at least to see his first child. I thought it would be sensible if he came on that visit at about the same time as his appeal against the refusal was heard so that he would be able to give evidence in his own case. All of that was done.

The Home Office admitted him at the port and the appeal adjudicator admitted him to give evidence. Sadly and disastrously, the case was turned down and eventually the young couple went to Ireland. I do not know where they are now and I hope that everything is well for them. I still feel very badly about what was done to them. After that, the Minister has the cheek to suggest that I have done something improper in allowing a young woman to have a visit from her husband to see his first child for the first time.

The second case of so-called abuse was that of a young man who lived in Tanzania. His family came to Birmingham in 1981 on a quota voucher which entitled British citizens to come and live in Britain. He was over 21 and was therefore not allowed to come with them. He applied twice for an entry certificate to come for a visit. As every hon. Member who has any experience of immigration will know, in practice, though not in theory, anyone who has ever applied to come for permanent stay will never be allowed to visit. That is what was happening to this family. When they applied to come as a family they knew that their son was over 18 or 21—I cannot remember which—but they said that they would like him to come with them if he could. The answer was no. He stayed in Tanzania and set up a small business, which is beginning to prosper.

Twice the young man applied to visit his family—his mother, father, sister and brother—whom he had not seen for some years and twice he was turned down in Tanzania. The family in Birmingham came to see me. I wrote a letter explaining that there was no legal obligation to have a visa, that he was entitled, as a Commonwealth citizen, to come without a visa and that he should therefore come over. I said that he would probably have trouble at the port because there is no doubt that anyone who has been refused an entry certificate for a visit will have trouble. I told his family that, if he had such trouble, they should telephone me. All of that was done.

He came and saw his family. They all came to my advice bureau and they all cried—father, mother, sister, brother and he—because they were seeing each other after such a long time. He returned to Tanzania before the Minister's letter arrived saying that he should go back. That is the second case of so-called abuse. The letter I wrote is the letter that was leaked to The Daily Telegraph. That is the outrageous behaviour I am supposed to have indulged in that helped to spark off the row we are engaged in today.

I think that the Minister should be ashamed of himself. It is outrageous for anyone to suggest that any hon. Member seeking to represent their constituents in that way is misbehaving. I resent it. It is wrong and suggests that we should neglect the needs of our constituents in a way that I am not willing to do.

I should like to explain to the House how it goes in Ladywood and at my advice bureau. I have an advice bureau every other Saturday in my constituency. It takes place from 10 in the morning and continues until about 1 or 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Large numbers of people who are willing to sit in a queue for that length of time come to say that their granny might be coming to visit, a sister might be coming or that a nephew is coming for a wedding. They say, "I am frightened that they will be refused. What shall we do?" In each case, I explain in detail how the system works. I explain that, if there has ever been an application for permanent settlement, a visit will not be allowed and that there will almost certainly be a refusal at the port. I tell them that they should then ring me.

I then write to the Minister and it takes him two months to reply. It used to be three months, but he has got the time down since then. He has been working at it since the row started. I explain, because it is the truth, that he always upholds the refusal. I explain that when I send the letter back to my constituent, the visitor has to go, even if a marriage or anything like that is planned. That is how it works. My constituents go away clutching a piece of paper with my telephone number on it.

Because I do that, and I do it repeatedly, and try to give my best advice to my constituents, I am in breach of paragraph 1(2) of these new guidelines. It will be held against all those potential visitors that I explain in that way to my constituents how the system works. That is outrageous. It is a constitutional breach that a Member of Parliament should not explain in truth and sincerity how the system works without biasing the potential right of their constituents to have a visitor from abroad.

The truth is — the House should note this — that almost anyone who is unmarried cannot get in as a visitor. That is because visitors are entitled to marry and remain. Because the immigration service thinks that every unmarried Asian coming in wants to marry, as a number of them do, it refuses the lot. Since the Minister changed the rules about marriage for women, the immigration service is now refusing many young women. That is one reason for the increase in the number of cases facing the Minister.

The Minister would be more honest if he took away the right for people who are here as visitors to marry and stay. It would not then be necessary to refuse every unmarried Asian male who seeks to enter Britain and, increasingly, every young Asian female. That is the way in which the system works. It is based on a prejudice and on seeking to exclude from a legal right a group of people—Asian people—who wish to come here as visitors.

I am probably running out of time, but I want to ask Conservative Members to please stop talking about immigration and about people trying to come into the country illegally and staying. That is another debate, which we will be happy to have with them, to challenge their prejudices. Today we are talking about family visitors and the rights of families to stay together. Yes, we deplore the action of the Soviet Union when it prevents families from being united and we claim to support the Helsinki Final Act and the right of families to be united. However, when it comes to our own Asian population and their wish to be close to members of their own families from abroad it is another matter. Suddenly we hear about swamping and immigration and so on.

The other thing that Conservative Members should understand is that the reason for the increase in the number of cases the Minister is facing is the increase in refusals. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) quoted the figures. If we could break the figures down by poverty or background, they would be much grosser. Obviously, from Bangladesh, India and Pakistan many wealthy people — business men, journalists and academics — travel to and from the United Kingdom and have no trouble coming through Heathrow. However, if one comes from a village and a poor family there will be trouble. I am certain that, if my constituents have a poor background, the likelihood of refusal of their visitors is about 50 per cent. That is my experience and theirs. They are poor, proud and hard working people from a poor background.

The Minister's guidelines are not necessary. Instead, we should stop refusing genuine visitors and treat our constituents with the respect they deserve.

6.18 pm

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): So far, the House has enjoyed a good-natured debate about an issue which, essentially, concerns the relationship between individual Members of Parliament, and the relationship of hon. Members with the Home Department.

I, too, thank my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State and very much appreciate the excellent work that he does, and the sympathetic way in which he receives the representations of hon. Members, myself in particular.

The control work of the immigration service is difficult. The officers do it with immense compassion and care. I know from my observation of their working practices that they try to assist visitors to the United Kingdom in a very reasonable way. They have interpreters on duty, and they have procedures for interviewing individuals, to try to ascertain the true purpose of their visit when there is any doubt. I particularly welcome the statement by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that 52 further posts are to be provided to improve the arrangements. That is good news.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) referred to the number of people from the Indian sub-continent who were being stopped at Heathrow, in particular. The facts are that only about 1 per cent. are ever stopped at Heathrow—99 per cent. of visitors from the Indian sub-continent who seek to enter the United Kingdom, for whatever reason, come through without hindrance. That is the measure of the matter. Therefore, we are concerned basically with the 1 per cent. of people who, for one reason or another, are subject to the immigration officers' control.

The guidelines that we are considering seek to provide a working formula, a relationship between hon. Members and the Home Department. They are generally to be welcomed, and I endorse them. There was a departure from the original draft guidelines, where my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State suggested that hon. Members should contact the port of entry to ascertain the facts. I fully understand the reason why that was included in the original guidelines. I think that hon. Members, regardless of where they sit, will know that it is difficult to make a decision about whether to phone the Minister's Department to impose a stop, as it is called, on whether a person should be deported.

That is the one occasion when an hon. Member has a direct means of intervening with the Executive. It is the one occasion when an hon. Member is acting in a quasi-judicial role. I believe that there is an obligation for the Member, under those circumstances, to take into account several factors—a duty to the country, a duty to the House and the rules that the House has approved, a duty to his or her constituency as a whole, a duty, too, to the immigration officers who are, after all, civil servants seeking to discharge their function fairly and honourably, as well as a duty to the individual who has sought the hon. Member's intervention.

If the hon. Member is seeking to discharge all those functions honestly, he would probably like to have the best available information to hand upon which to base a decision. Frankly, listening to the story of the application and then checking the facts with the immigration officer at the port of entry is a very good way of trying to understand exactly where the balance of truth lies. I frequently do that myself. I find that the chief immigration officer is always helpful. He willingly reads over the notes that have been taken, willingly answers questions and enables me to make a judgment on an informed basis about whether I should intervene with the Executive and the way in which its function is being discharged. That seems to me to be a perfectly reasonable and honourable way to proceed.

Although I note that the guidelines remove the obligation for an hon. Member, in the first instance, to approach the immigration officer in that way, I commend the principle behind that because it is sound if we are concerned about balance and fairness between the various competing interests that we have to judge as Members of the House.

The role of an hon. Member intervening in another hon. Member's constituency is a serious point. This place works only if we behave in an honourable way towards each other. If we intervened across the constituency boundary, choas would reign. It would become an unimaginable nightmare for us all, and is therefore undesirable. A Member should take up a case in another Member's constituency only in very exceptional circumstances.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wheeler: I shall not give way. I want to press on.

If there are special and exceptional circumstances—for example, if an hon. Member is ill or away—the hon. Member may say to a colleague nearby, "Please cover for me." However, as a general principle, that is wrong. It is within my knowledge that, unfortunately, there has been a certain amount of touting around, of seeking to find an hon. Member who would do the bidding of an individual or pressure group, willy-nilly and without regard to the consequences. There is some evidence that that has gone on. It must be wrong, and we must oppose it in the interests of the good administration of the House.

Mr. Bidwell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wheeler: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I press on, but time is limited.

In looking at the deadlines, we must have some sort of working relationship with the Home Department. In setting a deadline of 12 working days, my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State has got it about right. However, the guidelines are no more than that. Just as there are always special cases in respect of immigration matters as a whole, so there are always special circumstances that will affect the interpretation of the guidelines. My hon. and learned Friend has made it clear that he is always willing to consider those special circumstances.

I pay tribute to my hon. and learned Friend's private office. Outside No. 10 Downing street, he has perhaps the largest private office of any Minister, as befits the amount of the correspondence that he has to cope with. I, and I believe most other hon. Members, find that his private office is always willing to be of very great assistance to hon. Members who approach it. It is always willing to give useful advice and to see that cases are properly considered. In a dificult area, we try to establish fairness in the way in which we handle those immigration cases.

As the right hon. Member for Gorton said, even the Opposition intend to have a form of immigration control. The immediate consequence of that is that sooner or later, whatever the form of control, one will create hard cases, where there is an area of dispute or doubt. Any country that seeks to control entry into its jurisdiction, as we do in the United Kingdom, and as all other western countries do, comes up against the difficulty of making the procedures work.

I welcome the guidelines. They are a fair attempt to provide a working arrangement. I wish them well.

Mr. Stan Thorne (Preston): Like many other hon. Members who are participating in the debate, I have a large Asian community in my constituency. Many of the Asian families in Preston have been there for a period of anything from 10 to 20 years. Many have become naturalised British subjects. They still tend towards the extended family culture that was their background. Thus visitors seek to come and spend some time with them in their homes.

When we consider the Minister's proposals we are considering the question of human rights. We accept that it is a human right for people from many parts of the world to visit their relatives and close friends in this country. Many Asians in this country, after their experiences of the past few years, feel that their visitors are treated as criminals at airports. They feel that their visitors are not on trial but are guilty as and when they arrive. The only protection that the visitors have against such a situation is their relatives' Member of Parliament. Clearly, what has been at issue over recent months, directly or indirectly in this House, is whether hon. Members should continue to have the right to make direct representations to Ministers about cases.

I like other hon. Members would like to pay tribute to the way in which the Minister's private office responds when approached by hon. Members. Very often, one gets the impression that it is grossly overworked and under pressure. In spite of that, my experience is that it has been helpful. I wish that I could say the same for the Minister who is responsible for these matters.

Like other Members who have spoken today, I have regular surgeries. Today, almost 80 per cent. of the people who come to see me are Asians with problems that are directly associated with relatives, visitors, fiancés and so on. When these people enter a surgery, they are clearly looking for guidance from the hon. Member with regard to what they have already heard, directly or indirectly from other sources, are likely to be their problems on arrival at the airport. They want to know if they should go to the airport and, if so, how many of them should go. They want to know if they will be interviewed and what the nature of the interview will be. They want to know what regulations govern entry.

One tries to give these people some guidance in advance. Regrettably, of course, we sometimes do not get that opportunity. The first we know about an arrival at the airport is a telephone call which may come on Christmas day, new year's day, or a Saturday or a Sunday. The timing of the telephone call is obviously immaterial to the visitor but the hon. Member must try to respond.

Some of the visitors are fiancés who come purely to see members of the family. The very fact that they are fiancés places them in a different category and makes their position almost hopeless. Some visitors come to see their wives and they very rarely get past the immigration office, although that sometimes happens. The main task of the Member of Parliament is to represent those cases and to assist those people to meet their families.

I should like briefly, in the time available, to give an example of a recent case in my constituency. I do not want hon. Members to suggest that it is an isolated case which could not happen more than once because I am sorry to say that that has not been my experience.

The son of the sister of one of my constituents was working in Arabia. He came on a visit to the United Kingdom intending to go on to a further visit in India to see relatives. He carried with him a three-way air ticket Dhahran to London to Bombay to Dhahran. He also had a letter from his employer of five years, saying that he was well paid, receiving 250 rials a week and that he had given my constituent's relative three months' holiday and hoped that my constituent's relative would enjoy that holiday with relatives here and in India. My constituent's relative carried £1,500 in cash so there was no question of his not being able to pay his way. He arrived on Saturday 8 March and he departed on 8 March to India on the instructions and at the behest of the immigration officer.

There were long interviews at the airport, including an interview with the would-be visitor's uncle, a constituent of mine who has lived in Preston for 20 years. He was interviewed from 8.15 pm for three hours. He had no previous experience of the kind of cross-examination to which he was subjected and he did not know much about the work circumstances of his sister's son. How could he have? The interview that took place was, in his words, "shocking", "insulting" and "provocative". He is a diabetic with a heart condition. He collapsed during the interview and a doctor was brought in to attend to him.

That is the experience of a relative of someone who came to Britain for a visit. I cannot help feeling that if the visitor came from white South Africa or was a white European or a white American, that situation would not have arisen. It is no wonder that one feels that racism plays a part in the way that decisions are made at airports and in the Minister's office in such cases.

We should be considering more humane rules covering the entry of visitors to this country. It is clear that the Government's policy is not based on humane treatment and the protection of human rights, but is a deliberate policy of restricting entry to Asians. That is the Government's raison d'être.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): On 29 October last year, I received a letter from my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, saying that among my cases was one which represented the problems with which his Department was faced. I was asked in that letter if I would consent to the publication of the letters about my case. I wrote back on 5 November to say that I was of course only too willing for full publication to be made of that and any other correspondence relating to immigration matters that had passed between my hon. and learned Friend and myself. It was very important to my constituents that such matters should be fully ventilated. I am curious that Opposition Members did not write back in similar terms.

Most visiting has nothing to do with immigration. The more flexible the visiting policy, the less strain there is on other parts of our immigration laws. I do not share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) that we are in any way exercising a quasi-judicial function. How can I, as a Member of Parliament, elected to represent the constituents of Leicester, South, who include 18,000 people of Asian origin, in this one area and not in others, act in a quasi-judicial capacity? I regard that argument as a complete non-starter.

I shall state my position and be judged on it. I regard myself as an advocate—albeit a responsible advocate—on behalf of my constituents, who wish to receive a visitor. It is against that background that I invite my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State to consider a number of points. First, will he ensure that the interpreters in the secondary examination area at terminal 3 use direct speech and do not use indirect speech? It is inappropriate for an immigration officer to say to the interpreter, "Ask him this—" and to get the answer, "He says that—". It should be done exactly as it is in the courts and other places where accuracy of representation is essential and direct speech should be used.

After all, the crux of the matter often lies in the credibility of the person being asked the question. That is a tricky enough problem in a court where people using a language with which they are totally familiar speak face to face with others in direct speech. When the examination takes place in the secondary examination area through an interpreter it is an even trickier problem. It is not surprising if, in individual cases, immigration officers from time to time make mistakes about the credibility of the person to whom they are putting the questions.

Secondly, will my hon. and learned Friend instruct immigration officers to attach only due weight, and not undue weight, to lies that might be told by the potential visitor? There is too great a tendency to jump to the conclusion that, merely because someone is telling less than the truth, he is disqualified under the rules from entering. That is not so and should not be so. I invite my hon. and learned Friend to say that the immigration officer must be satisfied that the lie is relevant to the issue which he is considering and that there may be other reasons why the person is telling lies. Experience of life shows that a person sometimes tells lies to bolster an otherwise good case which he reasonably fears will not be believed by the person to whom he is speaking. That fact is sometimes overlooked.

My third point concerns deadlines. Will my hon. and learned Friend adopt a relaxed attitude to them? A letter which he sent to me and which contained deadlines took three times as long to arrive as an identical letter sent to my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester). I believe that, if we apply strict and unrelaxed deadlines, we shall come to grief.

My fourth point concerns removal costs. It is not generally known that, when the Minister has eventually turned down the Member's representation and said that the person here on temporary admission must go home, there is no objection to that person using his own ticket. Greater publicity should be given to the procedure whereby the visitor can use his ticket to go home and save the public purse. Recently, I have put this system into operation in my constituency and found that people were only too willing to pay their way back in just the same way as they paid their way here. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will give publicity to this. Merely because, at the end of the period of temporary admission, a person is told to go and instructions are given for him to leave the country should not mean, ipso facto, that the public purse has to pick up the tab.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary asked us to save the system. Frankly, I cannot save it. All I can do is work with it, with fairness and responsibility. That is what I sought to do under the old rules and what I shall seek to do under the new.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): The origins of this debate and the guidelines go back to last October, when the Minister of State, Home Office, met a deputation from the Immigration Service Union. The discussions were obviously very heated. The hon. and learned Gentleman has denied that the deputation threatened to withdraw co-operation in replying to representations by Members of Parliament in immigration matters, but it is clear that the ISU demanded that something be done about the number of representations by MPs on immigration matters. It was taken to heart by the Minister of State in the sequence of events so comprehensively outlined by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman).

There was a series of extraordinary events, including serious allegations by the Minister of State against a number of hon. Members for abusing the immigration laws. Days later, there were two full-page feature articles in the Daily Telegraph. The second carried the headline,

"Blake Baker concludes his report on unwelcome arrivals —MPs ready to greet dubious immigrants".

The article contained a mass of detailed confidential information which I was told in answers to parliamentary questions could only have been made available by immigration service management and/or the private office of the Minister of State.

The article produced a list of Members of Parliament, described as the "Top 20 MPs in the Terminal Three representation league."

It was an interesting list. It included the Conservative hon. and learned Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) —I agree with many of the views he expressed today— the Conservative Members for Slough (Mr. Watts) and for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler) and, surprisingly, the Conservative Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) who is the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister of State.

The article stated:

"Some might argue that more than half their interventions were justified. The converse is that nearly half were not.

What can be done? Apart from beefing up the Immigration Service, there could be extra controls at overseas points of departure, but that would mean extra burdens on British missions abroad. A financial bond by sponsors has been suggested.

A good first step, however, would be for MPs to restrict their intervention to only deserving cases of which they have firsthand knowledge and which they are prepared to substantiate."

Following several parliamentary questions by myself and others, I was eventually told that the disclosures to the Daily Telegraph were to be the subject of an internal inquiry in the Home Office. After some time, I was given a copy of a letter dated 27 February by the Minister of State to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short), which stated:

"The Home Secretary and I regret what occurred. The disclosure of your letter, the leaking of the statistical information and the manner in which both documents were handled within the Department were wrong. As a result new instructions have been given to staff in the Immigration Service making it clear that free circulation for general interest of copies of MPs' correspondence with their constituents is a serious breach of confidence; that such correspondence must be given the same protection as other official information; and that failure to do so can give rise to disciplinary and, in certain circumstances, criminal proceedings. It has also been made clear that while it is good management practice to make available to staff statistical and other information of current or topical interest about their work, official information which is available for management purposes should be appropriately restricted in its circulation."

So much for the internal inquiry and the clear breach of the Official Secrets Act. We were told that further inquiries would involve some 300 personnel and so far as the Home Office was concerned the matter was closed.

It is very clear indeed that the number of representations from Members of Parliament has increased in recent years. That is clearly due to the fact that the number of people refused entry to this country has also steadily increased over recent years. In 1983 the number refused entry was 13,981, in 1984 it was 17,355, and in a recent answer to another parliamentary question I was told that in 1985 the number refused entry was 18,505. Of those, more than 10,000 originated in the New Commonwealth and Pakistan. As has already been said, only a very small number seek the help of MPs—something like one in five.

In my view, this situation will continue until something positive is done. Yesterday I suggested action that could be taken by the Government—the introduction of a right of appeal, which could be exercised here, for those refused entry. That is a very modest proposal which was first made in 1967. I hope very much that, instead of making wild allegations about the irresponsible behaviour of MPs in these matters, the Government will seriously consider the introduction of such a welcome reform, which would in fact be the introduction of natural justice into these matters, and will allow those who are the subject of appeals to attend the hearings in the country where they are being held.

I am very concerned about a number of matters in connection with the immigration service. It was the subject of very critical comment by the Commission for Racial Equality, which criticised the racist attitudes of many immigration officers, the stereotyped attitudes which they adopt towards members of ethnic communities, the quality of their training and other matters.

I am very concerned about the very serious allegations that have been made concerning changes to and endorsement of the passport of a Hong Kong British passport holder, from which there were surreptitious and unlawful deletions which resulted in the person concerned being expelled from the United Kingdom.

I complained to the Minister of State about these very serious matters on 14 November 1985 and received a reply on 5 December saying that the Minister of State shared my concern about the allegations and agreed that a full inquiry would be carried out. That was confirmed on 13 January, since when I have heard absolutely nothing further. I hope that the Minister of State will be able to let me know very quickly what the present situation is with regard to the inquiries.

Terminal 4 will open on 1 April. At the moment it is seriously understaffed with immigration officers and no interpreters have been appointed. I was told that terminal 4 immigration staff would have to use the eight interpreters who are available at Heathrow. Instead of again abusing MPs who are trying to assist their constituents, the Minister of State would be much better employed ensuring that there are adequate numbers of immigration officers trained to do their jobs properly at all ports of entry, and certainly that there are appropriate numbers of interpreters with proper training and proper career prospects to help immigration officers at those ports of entry.

I will not reinforce the criticism of these guidelines that have been made by hon. Members on both sides of the House, but particularly by Opposition Members. In my view they are unacceptable and unworkable and remain unconstitutional. I certainly believe that they are wholly unnecessary.

I have proposed the introduction of a right of appeal, an increase in the number of immigration officers and improvement of the training of immigration officers. Those steps would reduce much of the burden now on the Minister of State and his officials and I hope very much indeed that the Government will respond suitably.

These guidelines are clearly designed to intimidate black and Asian British people into not seeking the help of their constituency Members of Parliament. These rules have clearly been introduced as part of the political direction which the Government have pursued ever since 1979 to introduce, step by step, further restrictions on entry into this country and to present more difficulties for people who wish to visit this country to stay with their relatives and friends here. A leak last year indicated that, within days of the Conservative Government being elected in 1979, officials were seeking by administrative means to make it more difficult for people to visit this country freely.

I hope that that political direction will be recognised and that when the Minister of State winds up we are not going to have a further dollop of waffle and abuse levelled against those Members of this House who seek to help their constituents. I hope that we shall have some indication that he is going to take positive action to tackle the problems which he, and he alone, can tackle. I hope that he will consider seriously the proposals that I have made and not treat us again to the sort of abuse and wild allegations with which we have been greeted so often in the past.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), although I did not agree with much, if any, of his speech, particularly because of what happened recently when I was a visitor to his constituency. Perhaps if I had let him know in advance, I would not have had to face the problems that I had at the university in his town; I might have received the courteous treatment which I believe is given to people when they come to this country.

I must at the start totally refute the impression given by Opposition Members that we have a set of racist immigration officers and that there are racists in the Home Office who are intent upon making the system unworkable, on picking out a particular set of visitors and making life unbearable for them.

The Labour party seems to believe that it is its prerogative and privilege to represent what are known as the ethnic communities. That is nonsense. There are hon. Members on the Tory Benches with larger numbers of such constituents than any Opposition Members have and I know from my own experience that everyone is given the fairest treatment.

But, in a situation such as that faced by my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State and the Government, in which there was misuse or abuse of the system, the Government were absolutely right to draw up a set of guidelines—and they are only guidelines—for Members of Parliament to follow.

In 1979, when I came into the House, facing a new experience, as most of us do in these conditions, I would have welcomed certain guidelines. I am glad to see that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) is in his place. He complained that the number of refusals is up. I suggest that he is casting a slight on the officials by implying that they are employing a different interpretation of the rules as they stand. Those rules have not changed, as the right hon. Gentleman will know, since they were introduced in 1971.

I think that the right hon. Gentleman was totally wrong, in giving the statistics which he produced, to ignore the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), because immigration officers are bound to look at those from disadvantaged countries much more closely than at those coming from more prosperous countries. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] On the basis that it is obviously going to be far more tempting for visitors from those places to overstay. This is partly the problem. It is naive of the right hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends to think that every visitor who comes through Heathrow airport or any other port of entry is a genuine visitor who has every intention of returning to his point of departure. Obviously, the majority do, but it is right that we and the Home Office should be vigilant. I am extremely pleased that the guidelines have been produced.

It is disturbing that at a time when, at last, immigration numbers are decreasing, which I and all Conservative Members welcome, the number of refusals seems to be increasing. That almost gives the hint that more people are trying the system. They are doing so because of the assistance that they have been given by certain hon. Members. They are trying the system because they know full well that some people will slip through the net.

For Opposition Members to chastise the Government for having stricter rules and interpretation of them and for considering closely those who visit the United Kingdom is, as usual, pure humbug. They do so for nothing more than political advantage. They seek to curry some favour with a certain sector of the community. Conservative Members, who represent fairly the interests of all their constituents from wherever they come and whatever their colour, will certainly be better respected at the general election.

I am worried about the present system because it is the easiest thing in the world for hon. Members, their secretaries or others who must deal with queries if hon. Members happen to be absent, to put a stop on, without thinking of the consequences or the merits of a particular case. Moreover, hon. Members know that once the intended visitors arrive and have had a stop put on them, the process of appeals and, ultimately, of removing them is long. It is a fact that a number overstay, and we are naive if we think that they do not.

Frequently in local and national papers one sees the publicity that such cases attract and, indeed, which Opposition Members attract in their political interests. The emotional side is emphasised and we have stories of "tugs of love". Under the system of appeal such people can stay for many years. It must be prudent for any country to examine carefully those who enter, whether as visitors or immigrants.

The guidelines must be accepted, and I welcome them for three reasons. First, there is absolute evidence, as the Minister has shown and Opposition Members have almost admitted, that there is some misuse of the system. Hon. Members have undoubtedly been advertising the fact that they are willing and able to help any visitor who comes and who is in trouble. I am a little worried, regarding cross-constituency interest, about the part of the guidelines which talks about national groups being used as an excuse for one hon. Member to take cases for another. That is an extremely easy excuse.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Carlisle: I shall not give way because I do not have time.

That makes it easy for another hon. Member, usually from the Opposition, to take up a case, in the hope of gaining political advantage. That is a dangerous road to follow.

The second reason why the guidelines must be accepted is that some of us have faith in immigration officers, their staff and the staff at the Home Office. Opposition Members, especially the right hon. Member for Gorton, have cast aspersions on the integrity of those officers who are doing a difficult job, which I find disgraceful. I tend to trust, if I can, men and women who have been trained to do their jobs and who have long experience on the basis that the authority given to them under the Immigration Act 1971 should not be absolute, but should certainly be considered and, in the majority of cases, accepted.

The third reason is that the various representations from hon. Members are clogging the system. That means more disappointments for those who are genuinely waiting to immigrate under existing laws or to visit. Because Opposition Members have been misusing and abusing the system it is probably making it more difficult for the majority of genuine visitors to enter. Hon. Members who have visited terminal 3 at 8 o'clock on a weekday or weekend morning, as I hope all hon. Members have, will understand how the system can clog up, and appreciate the time that it takes for people to come through immigration control. It is right that they should be vetted, but the system will virtually disintegrate under the spurious claims of Opposition Members in an attempt to bring in virtually every visitor who makes a protest.

More consideration should be given to the point of departure, where more questions should perhaps be asked of those who seek to visit. That could stop the heartache when people arrive who are obviously not genuine visitors. I urge my hon. and learned Friend the Minister to make further investigations into whether more work and, possibly, manpower can be put at that end to avoid the problems that we face at this end.

If hon. Members are so keen to represent and put a stop on virtually any case of refusal that comes to them, they should put their money where their mouth is and become the sole sponsor for the visitor. That should be published and the general public should know when those genuine visitors, as we hope they will be, return. In that way, hon. Members who make representations can be responsible for their actions.

I welcome the guidelines. They will be of tremendous use to hon. Members on both sides of the House, and I hope that they will receive a welcome from all parts of the House this evening.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I doubt whether anyone will describe the speech of the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) as a helpful contribution to our debate. I should declare that I am the chairman of the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service, although, obviously, that has no financial implications.

The Minister of State and his predecessor have given the strong impression that they resent the large number of representations made by Members of Parliament in cases involving refusals at airports and related matters. The Minister's predecessor, as early as the summer of 1979, was quoted in the press as saying that he was upset at the time spent signing letters to Members of Parliament about visitors' refusals. Last week the present Minister, in exchanges in the House, complained of the large number of letters that he had to sign which, apparently, had been scribbled—I use his word—by immigration officers.

It would have been wholly unsatisfactory to insist that Members of Parliament must contact the chief immigration officer about refusals when the sponsor has contacted us. All hon. Members know that there are no difficulties in contacting the Minister's private office, or in contacting the duty officer at the Home Office in the evenings or at weekends. Certainly, I have not experienced any difficulty. Leaving aside all the other issues involved, it is doubtful whether it would be so simple to contact the chief immigration officer, for example at Heathrow. Some hon. Members have mentioned the Minister's private office, and I wish to join them in stating that I have always found the staff helpful and courteous. I make no complaint about his private office.

When constituents contact hon. Members about the refusal at ports of relatives or close friends, it is not part of our job to act as some sort of judge and decide on the merits of the case. The original guidelines suggested that, if we contacted the chief immigration officer, he would tell us about the matters involved, and that we would then make the decision whether to make representations.

As I said in an intervention, when matters come before us concerning housing, social security, pensions and taxation, and all the other issues about which our constituents write to us or come to our surgeries to see us, we do not act as some kind of judge. We do not decide whether a person should be rehoused, nor do we look into all the merits of the case. Our job as Members of Parliament is to write as sympathetically as possible to officialdom and to make the best possible case on behalf of our constituents. There is no difference between cases like that and cases in which constituents come to see us about a close relative or friend who has been refused permission to enter as a visitor.

It is rather important to get our words right, because we are not talking about immigrants. The people about whom representations are made in such cases deny that they are potential immigrants. They are not immigrants in any sense, any more than the millions of visitors from all over the world who come to our shores and are presumably welcome—because tourism, it is said, is useful to the Exchequer—are immigrants.

The sponsor is usually worried and tense and in a state of distress when refusal occurs. He might well have been waiting at the airport for a long time, often overnight, and getting little information about the passenger he is there to meet. He becomes increasingly worried about what is happening. We have to picture the situation in which many of our constituents find themselves. At places like Heathrow more could be done, I believe, to advise people when a passenger has been held for further and prolonged questioning. The Home Secretary is now present and I hope that he will take note of that suggestion. Why is it not possible at Heathrow, and perhaps at Gatwick, to have an information desk manned by an immigration officer who could give up-to-date information about these matters?

I am often told by constituents—and I believe them—that they find it extremely difficult to get information about why someone has not been allowed in, but when refusal has not yet occurred. That difficulty should be resolved, and it would be beneficial, certainly for community relations, if something were done. It is also the case that many of the people contacting us have lived in Britain for many years. They are totally law-abiding—that is rarely in question. They often resent the fact that because the person whom they have sponsored, a close relative or friend, is coming from the Indian sub-continent that causes far more difficulties than if he or she were coming from some other part of the globe. They feel that people coming to Britain from the Indian sub-continent face far more difficulties than other people.

I readily accept that not everyone who says he wishes to visit Britain is a genuine potential visitor. I also accept that it is the job of immigration officers to satisfy themselves about each passenger under the relevant immigration rules approved by the House. Like my hon. Friends, however, I sometimes wonder whether there is an excessive amount of suspicion when a person comes from the Indian sub-continent. People who have lived in Britain for many years, who pay their taxes, and who have never broken the law and would never dream of doing so, resent being treated almost as criminals when they go to Heathrow and are subjected to hostile questions.

I am rather disappointed by paragraph 2 of the guidelines, which says that the Minister will not normally intervene to overturn a decision about refusal taken at the ports. I suppose that is why I have never received a reply from the Minister about refusal cases where he has not accepted the decision of the immigration officer. Presumably, in most such cases the letter that is signed by the Minister was written by the immigration officer or the chief immigration officer responsible for the refusal. It is hardly likely that that person will challenge his own decision.

I am far from happy either about paragraph 12 which says that the Minister is unlikely to overturn a decision where an appeal is dismissed and no recommendation is made by the adjudicator. In the main, I am not talking now about visitors' refusal cases. Some cases, often of settlement, are important—this is about immigration—and I hope that if new facts are given after an appeal has been turned down and after an hon. Member has written to the Minister of State, the whole case will be looked at properly and fairly even if no recommendation was made by the adjudicator. Some adjudicators seem to accept that they should not make a recommendation.

Paragraph 17 was the subject of a great deal of comment in the debate. I am not touting for business. Like my hon. Friends, I am always reluctant to take up an individual case from outside my constituency. I need a good deal of persuading to do so. I always reply to non-constituents—I am not talking just about immigration cases—and explain, politely and courteously I hope, that there is a long-standing parliamentary convention that a Member of Parliament does not take up individual cases from outside his constituency.

If some hon. Members on the Government side refuse as a matter of principle to take up cases of people who are refused entry, not only is that unfair to the passenger, but also, of course, to the person who has lived in Britain for many years. Just because a person lives in the constituency of such an hon. Member, why should he not be able to contact his MP to have the matter taken up? It is difficult simply to turn down a person in these circumstances and tell them that we are not able to pursue the case.

I hope the Home Secretary understands that point. My interpretation of the wording of paragraph 17 is that no one but an MP can contact the private office. That seems rather unfortunate and I hope that my interpretation is wrong. If, for example, one is away—say at the height of the summer or attending to parliamentary duties—I hope that the agent of the Member of Parliament will be able to make representations. The Home Secretary is nodding about what I have just said. It will be in Hansard and I shall send a copy to my agent just in case there are any difficulties.

I hope to see a fresh approach and more understanding from the Minister of State, who I hope will take a positive approach and not adopt a resentful feeling that receiving and signing hon. Members' letters is not right. That is all part of his duty as a Minister of State, just as it is our duty to take up cases about our constituents.

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): I should also like to acknowledge the great patience shown and the sterling work carried out by the people in my right hon. Friend's private office. I also acknowledge the extreme helpfulness of immigration officers at the ports. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) was extremely unrestrained in making allegations. I have a chance to answer, but officials in my hon. Friend's office and immigration officers do not have the same opportunity. For that reason the right hon. Gentleman's remarks were all the more disgraceful. I hope he will take an opportunity to withdraw them—especially his remark accusing me of touting. As the debate progressed he must have learned that the practice I follow and which I have explained to him is copied by a good number of Members in an effort to be helpful to their constituents. If he wishes to withdraw and apologise, I shall give way.

Mr. Kaufman: I greatly admire the hon. Gentleman's pro forma letter. I never thought of something like that, because I thought the Home Office would disapprove of it. Now that it has the stamp of approval of the Home Office, I might start using it myself.

Mr. Lawler: I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not apologised. As long as he uses the letter in the same responsible way as I use it, I will be more than happy to let him have a copy. His speech was short on, indeed completely devoid of, any constructive proposals — in contrast to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State who produced the most constructive proposal to come out of this debate: the appointment of 52 extra staff. That will be good news for all visitors to Britain.

This debate is about how to make a manifestly unfair system that is open to abuse work in an efficient manner. There is a danger that the demands of the minority who are refused admission will affect the rights of the majority. The rights of the majority are to enter this country with the minimum of fuss and the minimum of delay. The reason for this debate is that those rights are being infringed because of the time that immigration officers have to take in preparing reports, following representations from hon. Members.

It is not much of a welcome to arrive in a country and then have to wait eight or 12 hours before a decision is made about whether one will be allowed to enter the country. What would be the reaction of hon. Members if they arrived in Pakistan and found that they had to wait for 10 hours before such a decision was made? What would be the reacton of an hon. Member who went to meet his mother at Heathrow and found that he had to wait eight or 10 hours before a decision was made? Therefore, we have to balance the rights of the majority against the rights of those who are refused admission to this country. It is important not to forget the right of the majority to enter this country with minimum delay. The guidelines have been drawn up in order to try to alleviate those delays.

Of people refused admission, there are those who try to flout the system. It is acknowledged that people try to enter this country by the back door by flagrantly abusing the visitor system. However, the low numbers of absconders among those who are given temporary admission show that the majority of visitors are genuine. They sometimes fall foul of the regulations for two reasons. First, they fall foul of them through ignorance, lack of intelligence or lack of preparation. They may be unaware of all the questions that they will be asked. I should find it extremely difficult to draw up my family tree. I do not even know the names of all my cousins. Therefore, I understand some of the problems that face those who are less well educated.

Secondly, some people are misled by advisers in their host countries. That is deplorable and I hope that the Government will make representations about it to high commissions and embassies. My hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State is aware of the fact that recently I have had to deal with the sad case of a young man who was advised to tell lies. He was told that if he told lies he would stand a better chance of getting into this country. If he had told the truth, he would have had no problem. As it is, through his own folly and through being misled by advisers, who I dare say are making a pretty penny out of the racket they run, he has had to return home.

All these factors affect one group of people in particular: people from the Indian sub-continent. They account for 11 per cent. of non-EEC visitors but for 55 per cent. of the refusals. Despite that, it is wrong to imagine that everybody who is refused leave to enter is a potential illegal immigrant and that therefore we should wash our hands of them.

As the system exists, it is an abdication of responsibility if Members of Parliament do not use it and give a fair hearing to somebody who is refused entry. Hon. Members are only too happy on numerous occasions to prove that officials in other Departments are not always right. Therefore, nobody would claim that immigration officials are always right. They may not have all the facts. However, as with most official matters, there is a line of appeal: that line of appeal in immigration cases is through representations by hon. Members. Hon. Members therefore have a duty seriously to consider using the system and not to abdicate their responsibilities. Right hon. and hon. Members must acknowledge that it is equally wrong to ignore the "pressure to emigrate" argument. That must be acknowledged as common sense. It would be wrong to ignore the fact that some people will try to abuse the system by using the visitor system as a means of entering the country for permanent settlement.

The way to stamp out abuse is by having effective control and ensuring that the message gets back that the immigration system cannot be abused, because those who try to abuse it will be caught out. Fewer people will then try it on by coming to this country and attempting to use the visitor system to enter and settle here permanently.

I applaud my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's attempt to introduce a more efficient and better service for our constituents. I deeply regret the withdrawal of the first draft. I do not believe that the new guidelines will result in any change in the existing practice. They merely restate what is done now. The only definite change is the unfortunate removal of the instruction that in the first instance Members of Parliament, should go to the port of entry. I saw nothing wrong with that suggestion.

It is important for Members of Parliament to be made aware immediately of the reasons why somebody has been refused entry. Therefore they should contact the port of entry in the first instance. They could then decide instantly whether somebody was abusing the system and trying to enter the country on a false passport, using a cock and bull story that could not be supported by a shred of evidence. Members of Parliament would not seek then to make representations on their behalf. If, however, there has been a genuine misunderstanding, or if all the facts are not known, Members of Parliament can advise and help the sponsor to make more effective representations.

The initial draft would have been extremely helpful to our constituents. It would have enabled Members of Parliament to provide a much better service. It is a great shame that it was withdrawn and that we must continue to use the private office as a go-between. It is difficult to know how we can help to clear up misunderstandings if we do not know what the misunderstandings are in the first place. In no way would it have affected the rights of Members of Parliament, and it would have saved the time of all concerned.

I regret the removal of this positive step, and I hope that it will be reconsidered. It was removed for all the wrong reasons. It was removed partly because of a genuine misunderstanding and partly because there may be those who do not wish to get involved in such cases. However, it was also removed because of the deliberately misleading propaganda campaign that was waged by the Opposition. They waged a scaremongering campaign which needlessly, as I have seen from my mail bag, raised anxieties among the Asian community. That was thoroughly irresponsible and it is to be condemned.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lawler: In a moment.

I shall give an example of their deliberately misleading and irresponsible campaign. Recently I visited an Asian community centre where a petition was going round which said: "Please sign below, condemning these new guidelines which will restrict visitors' rights." The wording was only in English. Having talked to people there, I knew that a significant number of those who were being asked to sign the petition were unable to read English. Nevertheless, they were being told that it was all right to sign the petition, despite the fact that the wording at the top of the petition was a gross distortion of the intentions of the original draft guidelines.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lawler: We are on a time limit. I feel sure that the hon. Gentleman appreciates that that is why I do not intend to give way.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman said that he would give way.

Mr. Lawler: I have changed my mind.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Earnest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman is almost on his 10 minutes. He has another few seconds; that is all.

Mr. Lawler: As for the decision that somebody should be deported after four days, I ask for flexibility. That will create difficulties if arrangements have to be made in Pakistan or Bangladesh for somebody to meet a young girl or an elderly mother at the airport and convey them for some distance. There should therefore be flexibility.

If we are to be honest, the existing system is a safety valve. The system is not adequate, but it is a safety valve which, if screwed down further, will be unfair to visitors and sponsors. If, however, the screw were to be loosened, the system would be open to abuse and would be unfair to honest visitors and to the rest of the community. What we really need is a new system.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has exceeded his 10 minutes now. I call Mr. Jeremy Corbyn.

7.29 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): It is unfortunate that there is a 10-minute time limit in this debate.

The reasons for the debate are due entirely to the Home Office, which has created this issue. It has peddled it and used the media to attack Members of Parliament who take up immigration cases.

In a reply given to the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet) on 19 March, the Home Secretary grandly said that the guidelines now being issued are intended to find a "means of improvement" for hon. Members taking up immigration cases. Frankly, I fail to see what can be an improvement in a system that is designed to curtail the role of hon. Members effectively to represent people in this country who are suffering great difficulties because of the immigration laws.

Some weeks ago I quoted a letter which had been sent by the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) to firm of solicitors about an immigration case with which I was involved. She wrote:

"I wonder if you are aware that David Waddington is working towards the introduction of new regulations which will prevent MPs such as Jeremy Corbyn exercising an open market in allowing people, such as Mr. X, from coming into this country with illegal passports."

To put it mildly, that is a disgraceful letter. It is a disgraceful assertion which, I believe, could come only from private discussions with the Minister of State.

The background to this problem is largely of the Home Office's creation. We are now offered a new set of guidelines which are, frankly, unworkable. They are also unfair and serve to undermine the ability of a Member of Parliament to represent people in this country.

Paragraph 3 relates to representations and states that the removal of a passenger will be "deferred for a period of 12 days to enable the Member to submit written representations."

I do not know whether the Minister has any experience of what it is like to represent an area where one is dealing with many immigration cases with a limited number of staff. It would be physically difficult to get the necessary amount of work done in that time. The Minister has the largest office in Whitehall, but individual Back-Bench Members are lucky if they have one and a half or two full-time staff.

Paragraph 6 goes on to say there will be

"removal as soon as practicable", after the Home Office has made a decision on an individual case. I thought that normally there was an opportunity for a second representation if the Member of Parliament felt aggrieved at the first decision. It appears from the guidelines that that facility will be weakened, if not removed.

Paragraphs 17 and 18 go on to discuss the role of constituency Members when dealing with these matters. I have taken up many immigration cases and I freely admit that not all of them are, by any stretch of the imagination, from Islington, North. The cases may involve people from communities with which I have a special interest. They may be people who, because they are absolutely desperate, have sought me out on a Friday night, a weekend, or on a Christmas day. I have also had cases from constituencies where people do not feel able to go to their own Member of Parliament because of the known attitude of that hon. Member towards minority ethnic communities in Britain. I trust that the Minister will recognise that this service must continue.

In the guidelines we are told that copies of correspondence will be sent to the hon. Member the Home Office believes represents the immigrant concerned. How will the Home Office decide the constituency of a refugee or an asylum-seeker who has arrived at Dover western docks on a Sunday night? What ability does the Home Office have to decide that? There will be a serious invasion of individual's privacy as a result of these guidelines.

[Mr. Jeremy Corbyn]

The record of successive British Governments on matters of immigration is not an honourable one. We discovered from the debate at Christmas and from earlier revelations that the maintenance of artificial queues for entry clearance from the Indian sub-continent was a deliberate act of immigration policy.

On 16 January in a parliamentary answer to me, the Minister of State, Home Office admitted that the waiting lists of people for entry clearance at Dhaka in September, 1985, was 12,800, at Islamabad it was 7,000 and at New Delhi it was 1600. They are variations on the figures for December 1983 and 1984, but, nevertheless, they are disgracefully long waiting lists. If the Minister says that everybody must seek entry clearance in their country of origin and still maintain the disgracefully long waiting lists, is he surpised that there is a problem at some ports of entry in Britain? The Minister must consider seriously the staffing at the high commissions and the number of entry clearance officers in Britain.

I am often closely involved with the issue of refugees and asylum-seekers. On arrival, those people are often in a desperate state. Again, the record of the British Government and, indeed, most European Governments, in respect of treatment of asylum-seekers, goes well outside the United Nations 1951 convention on the treatment of such people. Poul Hartling, the United Nations high commissioner for refugees, made a statement on 29 April 1985 in which he said:

"Negative public attitudes and in some cases xenophobic reactions have tended to focus on asylum-seekers largely because of the inadequate appreciation of their special status and needs as a group distinct from the much larger category of alien economic migrants, but also for reasons such as their limited propects for successful integration in the prevailing economic climate."

That is said within the context of the poor record of a number of European Governments in their attitudes towards refugees and asylum seekers. There must be a serious debate on this issue and an examination of the record of the British and European Governments on this matter.

Last year the European refugee charter was put forward by a number of organisations and people of Europe. It makes a number of demands. The first is:

"Every refugee granted asylum by a member country of the EEC should enjoy the same rights of movement, work and political activity as nationals within the EEC."

One of the reasons why refugees and asylum seekers are badly treated throughout Europe is that they lack political rights. They have no voice and they are treated like shuttlecocks in international political manoeuvring. It is time that people understood what it is like for people arriving in Britain in a desperate state, suffering from political persecution, who then have to go through the indignity of the treatment they far too often receive from the immigration services at the ports of entry.

Those hon. Members who are keen to defend everything which the immigration service do should put themselves in that position. Last May we went through the hideous experience of the Home Office creating, peddling and refusing to recognise the way that Tamil people in Sri Lanka were being treated and the fact that they were seeking refugee status outside Sri Lanka. A visa restriction was introduced for those people. We have still not had an answer on when that visa restriction will be lifted—it was supposed to be a temporary visa restriction. Last December the Home Office did not adequately deny that it would not introduce visa requirements for those coming from Bangladesh. That resulted in many frightened people attempting to come into Britain over the Christmas period. It also led to an aggressive attitude from the immigration service towards people coming from Bangladesh.

At terminal 3 at Heathrow airport in December 1985, of the 688 people who were refused entry and removed from Britain, 140 were from Bangladesh. I dealt with a number of cases of Bengalis who had arrived over the Christmas period, and some of the questions which were put to them were absolutely disgraceful. One young man, whose case I took up with the Home Office, was asked why he wished to come to Britain over the Christmas period. He said he was coming for a holiday, to see friends of his mother's, and visit the sights of Britain. After he was unable to state a number of sights in the country that he would visit, and he admitted that he was not a Christian, he was then asked why he was coming here for the Christmas holiday. He was put through a humiliating experience and finally returned to Bangladesh, having lost money on his holiday. The only piece of Britain that he ever saw was Ashford remand centre.

A case came to my attention this Sunday of an Iraqi who has refugee status in Europe and who sought to come to Britain to celebrate the Kurdish new year at Kensington town hall on last Sunday. He was asked why he had been to see a Member of Parliament who had been to Russia and Afghanistan many times. I was that Member. I have never been to Russia or Afghanistan and I resent the way immigration officers should criticise and penalise individual arrivals in this country because they have chosen to seek assistance from an individual Member of Parliament—[Interruption.] There is nothing amusing about that, and I hope the Under-Secretary of State will consider this matter urgently.

If these regulations are allowed to go through they will curtail the rights of Members of Parliament to represent people, many of whom are desperate and are in danger. They are rights which must be protected.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): I have listened to most of the debate, which has been fascinating, and I have reached one conclusion — that despite Opposition criticism of the guidelines, this must still be among the easiest of all countries to get into. I entirely support people coming in for holidays or to stay with relatives, but it is totally unrealistic to allow people to buck the system and to stay permanently. It is clear to anyone with any common sense that the reason why we need the guidelines is that there are people who try to get round the system. But for those people there would be no problem.

I pay tribute to the way in which my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State handles these matters. Of all Ministers, he and his private office must be under the greatest pressure in terms of personal cases, and Members on both sides have paid tribute to him. I was sorry that the guidelines that he originally proposed were redrafted, although I recognise the pressures from various directions. Nevertheless, he may be sure that we regard the work done by him, his private office and the immigration officers as extremely valuable to both communities — those who come in and those who receive them.

It is a false assumption to think that immigration officers set out to be unduly difficult. Now and again, an officer may have had a busy day and not be so sympathetic as he was when the day began. That happens with everyone, even those who come to Members' surgeries. [HON. MEMBERS: "And the Members."] Yes, indeed. By and large, however, immigration officers deal sympathetically with people. The problem is the weight of numbers. The figures show a substantial increase in the past two years and something must be done.

The Opposition intend to divide the House. When I said in an intervention that they would be voting on the guidelines, I was told that the Division would be on the Adjournment, but that is a mere technicality. If, perchance, the Opposition won the Division, they would say that the guidelines were a dead duck and the Government would no doubt have to think twice about them. I am glad to see that the Opposition Front Bench spokesman agrees. So we shall be voting on the Minister's paper and once it is passed it will have parliamentary sanction.

The convention that we have discussed of Members not interfering in other Members' constituencies will then be established, as it were, in print. It has always been the convention that Members do not take up cases in other constituencies. If that convention were overthrown generally, for whatever reason, there would be chaos. The official Opposition do not favour proportional representation and argue, as I do, that we should retain the present system of voting and of every Member having a constituency so that constituency relationships can be retained. If Members can deal with cases in other constituencies, we may as well not bother with our special type of democracy.

The hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell), one of the most reasonable Opposition Members, surprised me when he said that he had many times taken up cases of immigrants seeking to come in from outside his constituency. The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), who is no longer present, said the same. I cannot accept that. Members are doing it for one reason—not out of sympathy but seeking to curry favour and saying to immigrants already in their constituencies, "This is what we have done not only for you but for people in other constituencies." When the Government's proposals are passed today, that kind of activity should stop.

I do not have many immigrants in my constituency, but this has happened to me. I had examined a case—anyone who knows me knows that I looked at it fairly and properly, without any rush, because I do not have many immigrants anyway—and I had decided that there was no case for that person to come in, or at any rate no case for my intervention. If the immigration officer took a different view, that was a matter for him, but I saw no case for intervention and said that I would not intervene.

Another Member of Parliament, not far away—I shall not name him as he is not present and it would be unfair—was approached, took up the case and achieved a stop. I asked the Home Office to send me a copy of the letter sent to that Member and to tell him that the copy had been sent. I then told the Member that if it happened again I would put it into the local paper that he was so enthusiastic about people coming into this country when they should not that he took up cases even in another Member's constituency. It has not happened since.

There is intense pressure from people seeking to get round the system and to come into this country.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East) rose——

Sir Kenneth Lewis: I will not give way as I have only 10 minutes.

It is not in the interests of immigrants already here to have a system with great leaky holes. There may be arguments between the two sides of the House as to how far immigration should go, but there is double talk. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said that of course he did not want to allow immigration to get out of hand and that there must be restraint, but then he said that the Opposition would vote against the Government's proposals. They cannot have it both ways. If we are to keep a tight hold on the number coming in, people must not be allowed to come in unlawfully through the back door by pretending to be merely visiting for a month or two.

I believe that the limit of stay should be two months rather than three months, because I believe that after three months the fare is paid by the British taxpayer. I am not altogether convinced that we should not have a visa system, although I appreciate that there are difficulties, so I shall not press that. Scarcely any other country does not have such a system. British people now need visas to get into Australia. Until we have a system of that kind, there will be problems and difficulties.

I support the guidelines and the work of my hon. and learned Friend the Minister, which I believe to be in the interests of the Asian and other communities who come here to stay with us, as well of the indigenous population.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I welcome the reasonable and moderate way in which the Home Secretary introduced the guidelines. He was at pains to reassure us about how they will work. However, many of us fear that the guidelines will be operated on the basis of the words as they are written down and not on the basis of the soothing comments of the right hon. Gentleman. I want to add my voice to the concern already expressed from both sides of the House about the operation of several of the guidelines.

In paragraph 6 we are told that, if a representation has not been received from the hon. Member after 12 working days, the person concerned will be removed as quickly as practicable. In the many cases which I have taken up over the past 12 years, I have usually been able to get representations in within 12 working days, but it is not always possible. There are practical difficulties. Sometimes there is a need to obtain a lot of supporting evidence. Sometimes there are language problems and difficultes in interpreting. Occasionally, if I dare say it, firms of solicitors are involved. As we all know, that slows down the whole process.

If we are to have a time scale of 12 working days, it must be operated with reasonable flexibility. It has already been pointed out that there may be practical problems of communication as well. When the Minister replies, I hope that he will assure us that at the end of the 12 days, his private office will attempt to remind the constituency Member about a case lest a communication has gone astray. It would be intolerable if people were simply removed at the end of 12 days without such a practical safeguard.

[Mr. John Cartwright]

Even more worrying is paragraph 9 of the guidelines which suggests that where the Minister has upheld an immigration decision against allowing somebody to come in, that person will have only four days after the decision before he is removed. If all went well and the Member of Parliament was in his place, ready to receive the letter, he could just about get the information to the constituent within the four-day period. There is not enough time allowed to get the views of the Minister, to give them to the constituent and to get the constituent's response. Sometimes that would be the first occasion on which the constituent would have seen the detailed arguments set out on paper. It is not reasonable to suggest this narrow four-day period after the Minister has approved the immigration officer's decision before the person concerned is removed.

On the vexed question of paragraph 17 and the role of constituency Members, I welcome what the Home Secretary said about a flexible approach; I hope that it will be flexible. The idea of the Minister's civil servants in the private office checking constituency boundaries to try to work out whether a Member of Parliament really had a right to raise a case is a frightening prospect. As my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) pointed out, many of the people involved have relations in different constituencies. The implication of the paragraph as it is written is that where the hon. Member is sick or absent, there has to be a formal arrangement for another hon. Member to take up the case on his behalf. I find that hard to accept in the real world. Members of Parliament do not tend to write each other formal letters saying, "Please take up my cases while I am absent or sick." In the real world arrangements are much more flexible and reasonable.

In my borough of Greenwich in south-east London there are three Members of Parliament, all from different political parties. We have a good working relationship on these issues. The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) and the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) are clearly more efficient than I am because they manage to close their offices during the month of August. My office keeps going, which means that I get all the immigration problems during August and I take them up on behalf of my parliamentary colleagues. Often there are problems at weekends. If someone wants advice in an urgent case on a Friday night, there is no time to send him off chasing another Member. I raise the matter, I inform my parliamentary colleague and I make it clear to the Minister that I am raising the case on behalf of another Member of Parliament. I give the Member the opportunity to take up the case, if he wishes. Therefore, there has to be flexibility in the operation of that rule.

I must also underline what other hon. Members have said about cases which the constituency Member directly involved is not prepared to take up. Occasionally, cases are brought to me by a constituent who is a distant relative of the person concerned and who is not the primary sponsor. When I ask why his brother, cousin or uncle in another part of the country has not taken up the case, I am told that his constituency Member will not get involved. Sometimes when I check that out, I find that that is fact. I make no apology for taking up such cases. If I have even a tenuous constituency link, I think that it is right that I should do that.

I am also concerned about paragraph 19 and about prior advice to travellers emanating from hon. Members. It is suggested that an adverse view will be applied only where the Member of Parliament is "fully aware that a passenger is most unlikely to be admitted under the Rules".

That seems to imply a subjective judgment on the part of the immigration officer, the Minister or the Minister's civil servants about what was in the mind of the hon. Member when he took the action. That is a difficult thing for anyone to attempt to do.

My experience is that people come to me and say, "My relation is coming for a family wedding. It is a very expensive journey. There is a lot of money invested in this trip and we do not want to discover when he arrives on Friday night that he will be sent back on Saturday morning. Can you please help us before he sets out?" I am sure I do the same as other hon. Members. I advise that the person should bring every possible shred of evidence which will convince the immigration officer that he intends to go home at the end of his stay. I also point out that if there are problems the person can contact me. I make no apology for that. In most such cases, people come through the immigration system with no difficulty. Therefore, again, there must be a much more flexible attitude than is suggested by the guidelines.

My experience of a great many problems experienced by visitors seeking temporary admission is that the private office is usually helpful. Most visitors seek permission to stay one month or two. The intervention of a Member of Parliament usually means that visitors get two or three months. When the Minister's letter refusing admission is finally received, many have already gone home. They have made a voluntary departure. Many others go rapidly after the Minister's decision. Having asked for one month, one or two want to stay for six months. I tell them clearly that that is not possible.

I have had two cases of absconders that I am aware of, both in the same month and from the same source. I regret those very much. I am sorry that they managed to evade immigration control but I am much more concerned about the hundreds of decent, honest people who would not have been allowed to attend family weddings and visit their relatives in this country had it not been for my intervention. That alone justifies the involvement of Members of Parliament in such cases.

I pay tribute to the Minister for the helpful view he has shown in cases of permanent settlement in my constituency. In compassionate cases and political asylum cases he has been very helpful. But he upholds every decision of the immigration officers in relation to those coming here for visits. Since many have gone by the time he tells me that they cannot come in, it seems to me that he is accepting too glibly the views of the immigration officers.

Unlike other hon. Members who have spoken from the Opposition side of the House, I think that there is a case for having guidelines. It is a good thing for hon. Members to know exactly what their powers are and how they can be operated. It is better to have them clearly written down than to have to learn the system on the job. But the guidelines must be fair, reasonable, practical and as simple as possible. Certainly they must not fetter the rights of hon. Members. The power of Members to involve themselves in the operation of immigration control is a vital part of the job of a Member of Parliament in monitoring the operation of the Executive. The guidelines, even in their revised form, could undermine that very important monitoring job. That is why I shall vote against the motion tonight.

Mr. John Whitfield (Dewsbury): I wish to concentrate on the fact that the provision in the original draft for hon. Members to contact immigration officials has now — unfortunately, in my view — been withdrawn. The immigration officer is at the centre of this issue. Under section 4 of the Immigration Act he has the statutory power to admit or to refuse entry.

Like many of my hon. Friends I was appalled at the passage in the speech of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) when he said that the immigration officers were prejudiced, suspicious and paranoid. Such language would be appalling on any occasion. To apply it to the immigration service, which I have much experience of dealing with, is not only totally inaccurate but deeply insulting. The right hon. Gentleman was invited to withdraw his remarks, but a few minutes ago he refused to do so. If he had applied those epithets to some of the views of his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) they might have been more appropriate. That lady made an impassioned speech.

Mr. Sheerman: It was a good speech.

Mr. Whitfield: It was a good speech, but it was a prejudiced, suspicious and paranoid speech. Many hon. Members on the Opposition Benches practise in the racial discrimination industry. They resort to such speeches to inflame racial passions. It is no surprise to me that, apparently, so many of the hon. Lady's constituents are worried in advance about whether their relations will be allowed to come to this country. The hon. Lady is frightening them. She is putting fear and paranoia into their minds by using such language.

There has been an increase in the size of the problem. That is why we are debating the issue. There has been an enormous increase in the number of visitors to this country and a corresponding increase in the number of people legitimately stopped at the ports of entry by the immigration officers.

Mr. Nellist: How big an increase?

Mr. Whitfield: We are concerned this evening about whether those who arrive at the ports of entry are visitors. Opposition Members seem to suggest that when anyone arrives at the port of entry and claims to be a visitor, that claim must be accepted at its face value. That attitude is nonsense. It is the difficult job of the immigration officers to interview people. There are three or four grades of interview — hon. Members who have inspected the system will understand how it works—and only a very small percentage—less than 2 per cent.—are stopped. They are stopped because the officers genuinely believe that they are not visitors but are trying to enter the country for some other purpose.

The stop power that hon. Members have brings with it a great deal of responsibility. It is not to be likened to our general duties as hon. Members to represent the interests of our constituents in dealing with local government and Government Departments. We have a power to interfere with the statutory power of the immigration officers. That power must be exercised in a quasi-judicial way and with responsibility. It is not simply a privilege. I cannot think of a better way of responsibly exercising that power than by speaking to the immigration officer who has dealt with the case and who will read out the notes in the file. One could then make a decision as to whether one should exercise the power to prevent removal.

The guidelines state quite clearly that the Minister of State will intervene to overrule the decision of the immigration officer only if he is aware of "new and compelling" evidence for overruling that decision. There has been little reference to that part of the guidelines. How can the Minister of State exercise his discretion if the representations made to him by the hon. Member concerned do not take into account the reasons why the immigration officer made his decision in the first place? The Minister of State cannot direct his mind to the question whether there are "new and compelling" reasons unless he focuses on that point. Hon. Members have a duty to consider that point before deciding whether to make representations to the Minister of State and, indeed, before deciding whether to intervene and place a stop on removal.

I was very surprised to hear some of my hon. Friends, as well as Opposition Members, objecting to contacting the ports. I understand that some hon. Members have said that that would impose too much of a burden on them. That is an extraordinary statement. If they had argued that too great a burden would have been placed on the immigration officers—who have many other things to do—one could have understood the argument, but for an hon. Member of whatever political persuasion to complain of the burden of having to ring the port of entry seems extraordinary.

It is also extraordinary that some hon. Members would apparently wish to put a stop on cases whatever the facts might be. Those who take such an attitude seem to be in danger of seeking power without responsibility and wishing to intervene blindly in cases without any reference to the facts.

We operate our system of immigration control instead of a visa system. Many of my hon. Friends would prefer a visa system. There are difficulties connected with such a system. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) said, this country must be one of the easiest in the world to gain entry to. When we are dealing with visitors or potential immigrants from the Asian sub-continent we must remember that the rules that apply to those going the other way are totally different from those that operate here. I am sure that the Pakistani and Indian Moslem communities in my own constituency would not themselves wish the system to be made any easier that it already is.

Mr. Sheerman: Do they want to make it harder?

Mr. Whitfield: No. They wish the system to operate in a responsible and restrictive manner, because that is what immigration control is about. They would deplore some of the remarks that have been made by Opposition Members about the immigration service.

I seriously request my hon. and learned Friend carefully to consider reviewing the rules within a short time. I suspect that, without the requirement on hon. Members to ring the immigration officers at the port of entry and find out the reasons for the initial decision, the number of stops and representations that have brought the present system so near to collapse will continue to increase.

8.8 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Tonight's debate clearly arises from the Home Office's attempt to restrict the right of Members of Parliament to challenge refusals at the ports of entry of people who wish to visit Britain. As previous speakers have made clear, and as the press has reported in the past 10 days, the original document issued by the Minister of State was changed before tonight's debate. That is not so much a U-turn as an S-bend which has been imposed on the Minister by his foreman, the Secretary of State. But the restrictions that are left will create serious difficulties and injustices for the relatives of the people in Coventry and other towns and cities who are affected by the Government's immigration controls.

We have heard from the speeches of Tory Members, that have been prefaced in remarks made outside the House and in newspaper articles, that it is all a question of numbers. That is a game that Tories love to play. It was started by the Prime Minister in 1978 in her famous television interview when she talked about Britain possibly being swamped by people of an alien culture. Some Tory Members go rapidly downhill when they carry on from those remarks.

What are the numbers under consideration? Let us start with an analysis of the people who are affected by the Home Office guidelines. The latest figures are from 1984 when a total of some 7·7 million visitors came to Britain. That is an average of 21,000 people a day. The number of visitors who were refused entry was 17,355, or 50 people a day. The number of people who sought assistance from a Member of Parliament was 3,532, or 10 people a day.

Tory Members justified the new guidelines by saying that since 1984 there has been an enormous increase in the number of cases taken up by Members of Parliament, which is putting such a strain on the limited resources of the Home Office that it is necessary to restrict the rights of the Members of Parliament. Well, I have the figures for 1985. The number of cases in which Members of Parliament made representations to the Minister of State, Home Office, was 5,694—in other words, 15 cases a day. If the Home Office cannot handle 15 cases a day—people who may have invested their life savings to come for a once-in-a-lifetime visit to see a distant family—it is not for the Minister to restrict the rights of Members of Parliament. Why has he not considered an increase in staff in his office or the ancillary departments within the Home Office in order to deal with that huge increase in work of an extra five cases a day?

Incidentally, while we are playing the numbers game, I notice that virtually no Conservative Member has let slip that there happen to be 200 million people or more who could arrive here tomorrow morning as visitors without the Minister of State being able to do a thing about it. Under the much-loved treaty of Rome, under which the Tories took us into the Common Market some 15 years ago, that is the number of people who, with the free movement of capital and labour and all the rest of the phrases which justified our entry into that big business club, could arrive here without restrictions similar to those that we are discussing tonight.

The difference is that visitors from the EEC will still be tourists, like the relatives of my constituents on whose behalf I have made representations to the Minister of State, but they will be spending deutschmarks, not rupees. Visitors who come from north America will be spending dollars and not rupees. When the Government, and those Tory Members who have spoken so far tonight, say that those Labour Members who have spoken are somehow accusing the Government of a racist attitude, there is an element of that. The statistics show that those who have been refused entry to Britain from the Asian sub-continent —India, Pakistan, Bangladesh and so on—are 44 times more likely to be refused entry at a port of entry than someone who comes from north America.

The second theme in the debate is an attempt by the Minister and the Government to reverse the concept of justice which is supposed to operate in Britain. I shall not digress into what has happened recently in Wapping and during the miners' strike to show what justice in Britain really means, but I shall say that the guidelines turn the concept of innocent until proved guilty on its head. Every schoolchild in Britain is taught that, under the British system of justice, a person is innocent until proved guilty. The Government are trying to change that concept in a number of ways.

I am a member of the Committee which is considering the Wages Bill which gives power to an employer who thinks that somebody has stolen some money from the till to declare that person a thief, deduct the money that has been stolen from his wages and then to offer the person the right to go to an industrial tribunal to prove his innocence —guilty until proven innocent. There is an element of that in the guidelines that we are considering tonight.

The entry clearance officer will decide that somebody who seeks to come into Britain as a visitor is guilty of breaking one of the rules and that person will be told to prove his innocence from 10,000 miles away unless a Member of Parliament can intervene on his behalf, asking for a review of the case by the Minister of State acting on behalf of the Secretary of State. I would prefer the Bill that was proposed yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), of which I am a sponsor, which gives people the right to appeal in Britain. The rules boil down to the fact that an entry clearance officer can declare that somebody is guilty and the only chance of proving that person's innocence is if a Member of Parliament intervenes.

Again today, Tory Members have said that there are widespread abuses and misuses of the system. I have yet to hear a concrete illustration to back up that argument, but in all the cases that I have handled since I came to the House in 1983 where an entry clearance officer has told a relative or a friend of one of my constituents that he is not a genuine visitor to Britain and that he will have to go back, not one person has absconded.

In several cases I have made representations on behalf of a visitor who might be asking for, say, a three-month holiday, and it has taken the Home Office four months to review the case. I have had to apply pressure to get the person's passport back so that he can leave after his three-month holiday to go home. Before the Home Office can work out whether a person who has been accused of not being a genuine visitor is a genuine visitor, that person has had his genuine holiday and is trying to return home.

It often takes three or four months to work through such cases. The checking of statements is a detailed business which requires cross-checking of all the questions asked. It takes the Home Office, with all its resources, reference books, legal expertise and staff three or four months and sometimes more to deal with such matters. Yet Members of Parliament are asked to complete a similar exercise. That was initially to be carried out in 10 days, but as a concession we have now been allowed 12 days in which to build up a quasi-legal argument against the Home Office, with all the resources that it has to defend its position.

The hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) referred to the idea that Members of Parliament are willingly going around the country collecting the cases of other Members of Parliament. That is a fatuous suggestion. The Labour party proposes a 35-hour week, but there are times when I think that we should bring in a 35-hour day so that I can at least have a couple of hours off. The work load of a Labour Member of Parliament, particularly in an inner-city area with getting on for 50 per cent. unemployment, makes that a ludicrous suggestion.

But it does happen that Tory Members will capriciously refuse to take up a family's case and the only alternative is to find a more sympathetic Member of Parliament to act on that family's behalf.

Mr. Wheeler: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Nellist: I shall give way in a moment.

One such case has come to light as a result of discussions with my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). An Egyptian man was an overstayer who had, like many others, breached immigration control, through a combination of ignorance and carelessness. He asked the hon. Member for Westminster, North to intervene with the Home Office. He was told that he would have to exercise his right of appeal from abroad. The Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants managed to get in touch with my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North. He took up the case with the Minister and asked him to exercise his discretion, because the man had had a long-term relationship with a British woman. The Minister exercised his discretion in favour of that Egyptian man, and that couple are now happily married and in this country. But if it was left to some Tory Members, that appeal could have been made only from thousands of miles away and would have caused great distress and unhappiness to those people.

Another important restriction, the 12-day rule, is to be found in paragraph 3. But what would happen if my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park) was on holiday, and if I and my secretary came down with flu after agreeing to cover his immigration cases? In such circumstances, how could a Member of Parliament compete with Home Office staff, who can cover for one another? The Member of Parliament would have to sift through all the arguments and the extraneous and often irrelevant questions of entry clearance officers, along with the relevant points of law.

Paragraph 19 amazes me, because the Minister has seriously put forward the idea that knowledge of one's rights under the law is prejudicial to exercising them. That is what paragraph 19 would, in effect, mean. What other section of British law means that knowledge of one's rights under it is prejudicial to exercising them?

I turn to the theme underlying the rules and the Government's attitude towards Asian workers and immigration in general. That provides, after all, the backdrop to this debate. It is ironic that, with the active participation and support of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), the Tory Government toured the world in the 1950s and 1960s asking people to come to Britain, because it was short of labour. It was a bit of an illusion, but they said that we had a booming economy and needed people to work in our factories.

When that illusion petered out in the 1970s and 1980s, those same Tory politicians, backed by their friends in the media, began to encourage working people, and particularly those suffering from the deteriorating economy — the unemployed, the elderly and those in receipt of supplementary benefit — to see immigration and those of a different colour skin as the cause of their problems.

Such talk increases and fuels the conditions in which racism, Fascism and organisations such as the neo-Nazi National Front breed. Immigrants, and their relatives and friends who wish to visit them, are not the cause of bad housing, deteriorating living standards or high unemployment. Black and Asian workers, particularly the young, often suffer the most from such conditions. We have a Tory capitalist system that is willingly presided over by a Tory capitalist Government who cannot deliver the goods. That is why there is mass unemployment. It is nothing to do with the number of black or Asian workers in Britain.

These rules and restrictions on the right of Members of Parliament adequately to defend their constituents' relatives and friends, or the rights of passengers and visitors to this country, are based on the same prejudice and racism that are at the root of much of Tory legislation on this issue and, unfortunately, of previous Labour legislation. That legislation is discriminatory and racist in its operation. It causes hardship and suffering. I look forward to the day when we have a Labour Government who will sweep away all such legislation to where it really belongs—in the dustbin of history.

Mr. Patrick Ground (Feltham and Heston): There is a large ethnic minority of Asian origin in my constituency, and I have made many representations to the Home Office since the election of June 1983. I came with some trepidation to hear whether I was one of the 23. But, like the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell), I escaped.

My experience of dealing with representations is in some respects very similar to that of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist). I have seen all those who have been refused entry, with their sponsors, and in practically every case I think that they have returned home more or less at the end of the stated period. I share the feeling that many people of modest means who have paid a lot of money to come here would have forfeited it but for the system, with all its faults.

Like the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall, I attach great importance to the sponsor. Unlike many hon. Members I regard the sponsor as the constituent on whose behalf I am acting. The visitor is not strictly speaking a constituent. The sponsor's position is extremely important. Often, he has paid for the visit, or he has certainly contributed to it. He normally provides the visitor's food and accommodation. I do not accept the view that Members of Parliament who make representations in such cases are acting in a quasi-judicial capacity. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) meant that. I think that he really meant that Members of Parliament should show judgment in making representations to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister.

I believe that a Member of Parliament exercises his judgment when making representations if he is satisfied, as far as he can be from the representations made to him by the sponsor and the visitor, that the latter will return at the end of his short stay. The sponsor is essential at interviews, because the visitor often cannot speak English well enough to conduct a detailed conversation. It is the sponsor who greatly influences one's confidence as to whether the visitor will return.

I have found sponsors to be generally reliable and responsible, and concerned, in the interests of their good reputation and understanding, to ensure that such undertakings are honoured. When anything has gone wrong, they have felt considerable responsibility for it. As the Member of Parliament often needs to see the constituent or sponsor, I believe that the time limits in the guidelines are a cause for some anxiety. Plainly, it is difficult in many cases to arrange a surgery appointment and see people concerned within the time limit.

I am convinced that some flexibility and good sense must be shown by the Home Office—I am sure that it will be—to cover the situation where a Member of Parliament has been unable to arrange an appointment in sufficient time to make representations within the time limit for reasons of time, pressure of work, holidays or whatever. Certainly, for those hon. Members who make a large number of representations, it is no laughing matter to be tied to a rigid rule.

I am content that it should be a guideline and I am confident that it will be treated accordingly, with the understanding which has been shown, in my experience, by the Office of my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State. I should like to join those hon. Members who have complimented the staff on the courtesy, patience and competence they have shown in administering an extremely difficult system.

I do not believe that the reasons for the increase in immigration cases—or visitor cases representations more accurately—is due to any change in the habits of hon. Members. I believe that the Asian community is now becoming more settled, established, confident and economically prosperous, and Asians have enormous numbers of poorer relatives whom they wish to invite to this country. With the cheapening of air travel and the increasing habit of travel in the Third world, there is bound to be an even greater increase in the future in the number of visitors coming to visit members of the Asian community here. I think that the Home Office must face up to that prospect and discover how it will deal with it.

One area of improvement was suggested in the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer). He suggested that some guidance or instruction could be given to immigration officers so that, where there has been an application for permanent settlement and some blatant lie or exaggeration told in the interview, they do not automatically refuse entry. Perhaps they do not. However, there is a pattern to cases, and it appears that even in cases of minor dishonesty or vanity, refusal is the result. Many of the people concerned have simply exaggerated their worldly goods or income for reasons which are perfectly understandable when they come from a village in India to a vast modern airport in what must seem to be a relatively prosperous country. They naturally want to exaggerate their position. That is perfectly understandable and will no doubt continue. That should not be a reason for refusing entry to a visitor.

Similarly, many of them forget some relative whom they choose to forget and fail to mention to the immigration officer in the family tree interrogation. I do not want to be critical because I think that the decisions of the immigration officers, on the whole, are perfectly understandable when they see the people before them. I can well understand how the decisions are arrived at. However, I think that in the future there is room for the immigration officers' attention to be attracted to the real question of whether the visitors are likely to go home at the end of their stay, not whether they have told fibs or varying sorts of exaggerations in the process.

I am concerned that when potential visitors to this country go to Foreign Office establishments abroad and say that they want to visit this country they are told that there is no need for visas or any form of documentation. Those same people, when they arrive in this country, can be subjected to the immigration procedure, told that their reasons are not genuine and that they should return straight away, when they or their relatives have spent vast amounts of money to come here.

I share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) that we should look at a visa system. If India and the United States can administer visas surely it is not beyond the bounds of the competence of the Foreign Office to do likewise. That would take out much of the unfairness and administrative hassle of the present system. Similarly, the question of guarantees should be looked at further to see whether that is a short cut to a solution to the problems we are experiencing.

In all the discussions on guidelines we must not lose sight of the fact that we are really considering a safety valve which prevents a great deal of human misery, unhappiness and loss of resources. We are doing so in a context which ensures that the visitor system is basically honoured. I agree that we are talking not about immigration but about visitors. I also agree that if visitors can come and go with reasonable freedom and generosity of treatment, that helps to make the strict rules on immigration much more acceptable in the community. I think that that must be borne in mind when the Government are fixing time limits for removing people. They should err in favour of giving them the few weeks or months for which they normally come.

I view the guidelines with some anxiety but I have come to the conclusion that they will work if they are interpreted and followed with the good sense and flexibility which, on the whole, has been the practice of the Home Office in these matters, and with the continuing courtesy, efficiency and skill of the staff who administer them. Therefore, I shall support the guidelines, but I think that for the future the possibilities of a review of procedure should be borne constantly in mind by the Home Office. The guidelines in themselves will not reduce the problem of numbers and the massive scale of administration will remain and should be tackled before the machine is over-encumbered as it has been in recent months.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Opposition Front Bench will try to catch my eye at 9.10 pm. On behalf of those hon. Members who still wish to speak, many of whom have strong constituency interests and have been here all afternoon, I appeal for even more brevity.

8.38 pm

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): I want to add my tribute to the Minister's staff. However, in my opinion, the words on the Order Paper are not correct. We are not discussing immigration cases today. We are discussing the difficulties experienced by visitors from the Indian sub-continent and the attempts by the Home Office, in issuing guidelines, to constrain the attempts of hon. Members to get the same treatment for those with brown skins and a working class background as that given to those visitors who have white skins.

If we were to accept the proposed guidelines, they would establish a dangerous precedent which would undoubtedly be used by other Government Departments. Since 1974 I have encountered only one case out of many hundreds where an individual sought to evade the immigration laws. Unlike some Conservative Members, I have not experienced floods of people coming into the country as visitors and then trying to disappear.

Frequently, however, very temporary admission is granted, sometimes of only three days' duration, for the flimsiest of reasons, in cases where the sponsors, my constituents, who are known to me, are sincerely prepared to guarantee that the visitor will return at the end of his visit. I can confirm the experience of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), in that I am often asked to provide a letter, which might help to expedite the passage of people's relatives through immigration, because, as my right hon. Friend said, they expect trouble. That should not be so.

At a meeting with the Minister of State, because of arguments about what is actually said at interviews, it was suggested that the interviews should be taped. Those who were in the delegation were then faced with estimates of the cost, which suggested that the estimaters were setting up a studio for "Panorama".

It has been suggested by the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) that if only everyone told the truth, there would be no problems. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman is in his place. But sometimes the truth is not enough. During the period of office of the Labour Government—therefore, I shall not be accused of bias—I had a case to deal with of a lady seeking a visa being asked for details of her family, who, she said, were at home, but she could not bring them to the High Commission. The problem was solved only when the then Minister visited her village. The Minister was the husband of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short). He discovered that the men in that family were woodworkers, and had carved the family tree in the wooden mantlepiece around the fireplace. So the lady did have the family tree details, but obviously could not bring them to the High Commission. Therefore, honesty and truth are not always sufficient.

The proposed guidelines are not helpful, and I do not think that they are intended to be. However, what would help is a requirement that all visitors to Britain be treated in the same way.

8.42 pm

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): It is important that there should be a balanced view. This evening, we have heard of three plus points. The draft rules will be subject to further revision if that is found necessary. That is essential. We have the code of practice and, furthermore, the 52 extra staff to do the additional jobs.

I also pay tribute to the Minister for the work that has been done over the past years. Some 25 per cent. of my electorate comes from abroad. Like the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) I have a certain amount of experience in this line.

I should like the Minister to clarify one point for me. The total number refused entry in 1984 was 17,355. The number of refused passengers who were represented by Members of Parliament was 3,532. That figure increased in 1985, as we have been told today, to a total of 5,694, and it escalated to 7,000 in 1986 on an annual basis. However, unhappily, we do not have the figures on the other side for the total refused entry during 1985 and 1986. I feel that they are rising in direct proportion. Some people are lucky to have Members of Parliament who can intervene on their behalf. The Minister will remember an intervention that I made. I was successful in getting an immigrant put on a dialysis machine. If I had not succeeded, he would have died. That is one of the things a Member of Parliament can do for his constituents.

Who should take up cases? That matter is referred to in paragraph 17 of the guidelines. I say that it is the responsibility of the local Member of Parliament. That is determined by where the sponsor lives. It must have occurred to hon. Members that if the sponsor is changed, with the consent of the Minister, another Member of Parliament can be invited to intervene. For example, the sponsor might live in Bedford, but his local Member might be away on extended leave and thus not be able to act. He or the family could go along to the private office or the Department and ask for another sponsor to be appointed with a fixed address to which the person could go. In that case, that Member of Parliament could intervene. Therefore, my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) was right to suggest that it must be the local Member of Parliament who deals with those cases, since otherwise there will be some interesting but tumultuous changes.

When the draft rules came out, I read them most carefully and came to the conclusion that it would assist Members of Parliament if we could refer to the port of entry first. In fact, I have done that on several occasions. I always interview immigrants when they come from abroad. I cross-examine them and come to my own conclusion. Where I cannot make the ends meet, I may consult the port and get additional guidance. Those at the port might say to me, "We have much more information on this case than you could possibly get. If you will take into account this additional information, you may come to the conclusion that we have reached." I would not necessarily be persuaded by it, but such guidance is extremely useful in reaching a conclusion.

I hope that when the Minister reconsiders the matter, generally he will remove or revise some things to which we have not referred today, such as the primary purpose rule. That is causing much more confusion than anything else to my constituents and those who are coming in. However, as it does not arise directly out of the debate, I shall leave that aside.

Paragraph 2 of the guidelines states:

"the Minister will not normally intervene to overturn the decision of an immigration officer unless he considers that there is new and compelling evidence which was not available to the immigration officer."

It occurs to me that compassionate factors may well be new. They may not come up at the time. That may be an additional point. Immigration is inclined to overlook the cost for the immigrant of coming in. The sum of £500 or £600 is large. I pray in aid the fact that of the people who have been represented by Members of Parliament, who have done so remarkably well, only 2 per cent. have absconded, gone to ground or been lost on the way, which is a trifling figure. I have had long experience, exactly the same as the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell). He has had a low percentage, too. If the immigration officers are so concerned with the build-up of cases, and they make mistakes, the advantageous influence of the Member of Parliament must be maintained.

8.48 pm

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): I apologise for not having been present at the beginning of the debate. I was engaged on Select Committee business.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), referred to an article in the Daily Telegraph, which gave the league table of hon. Members who had dealt with cases at terminal 3. I gather from that that I am number four, so only three hon. Members have dealt with more cases than me. However, despite that, I was not on the Minister of State's list of hon. Members who had, as he put it, abused the regulations. If I have dealt with all those cases and have not committed any abuse, that must give me some status in this debate. Not having committed any abuse, I feel very sore, annoyed, and angry about the situation. Perhaps the Minister also feels sore and angry about the job that he has to do.

Ms. Clare Short: He should resign.

Mr. Leighton: Yes, the Minister could resign. I am told that only about 1 per cent. of the travellers who pass through terminal 3 at Heathrow are stopped. I sometimes think that all those people must come from the London borough of Newham. That is how it seems to me. I feel like an extension of the Home Office and I resent that. I resent the work that I have to do and the hours that I spend feeling like an extension of the Home Office. The Home Office should give me a member of staff, a civil servant who would sit in my office. Instead of my ringing up a civil servant, why should I not have a civil servant to do all the work that the Minister of State causes me through the current system?

I should like that point of view to be taken seriously. I sometimes think that I speak to the Minister's private office—to which I pay tribute—more than the Minister does. If my having a member of staff who is a civil servant is not a good arrangement, perhaps the Minister of State could use his influence with his colleagues to give me an extra allowance. I could then employ—as I have to—one person simply to deal with the problems faced by visitors entering through the airport.

I suspect that some form of instruction has been issued to the effect that when in doubt, say no. The visitor will go to a Member of Parliament who will take up the matter and if there is a problem, the Member of Parliament will make representations and have everything put right. I cannot think of any other explanation for the present situation.

Anyone who wants to visit this country ought to be allowed to do so. Why should they not be allowed to do that, especially if they have relatives in this country? Hon. Members know, and I know from experience in my constituency, that numerous people are unreasonably refused entry. I stress unreasonable. The proof of that lies in the constant correspondence that I have with the Minister of State and he must get fed up with that. In his replies, he says that he has carefully considered my representations but on balance, having given great consideration to the matter, he concludes that he must uphold the immigration officer. That means that the relative of my constituent who wanted a two-month visit has had a three-month visit while the Minister has been considering my representations. Therefore, the Minister of State sadly authorises the departure of my visitor. I must then write another letter and have my special employee write to say that the Minister of State has turned my visitor down but he has had his three-month stay. That must prove that my visitor was a genuine visitor and that the immigration officer had it wrong. The vast majority of the cases that I deal with are dealt with on that basis. I resent the repetitive work that I have to do which involves dozens of cases every month.

I shall consider only paragraph 19 in the guidelines. That paragraph concerns hon. Members advising people to travel. I have people coming to me saying that they have relatives coming to this country. I tell them that this is a free country and that they can come here for a visit. However, my constituents say that they expect trouble as all their friends have had trouble. I tell them that if it is a reasonable case they should have no problems and that their relatives should be allowed entry. My constituents are not satisfied and say that they have spent hundreds of pounds and they want to know where I will be on a Sunday morning in four weeks' time in case of difficulty. I have to tell them that I do not know. They then want to know where I will be at 3 o'clock in the morning, and I tell them that, with a bit of luck, I will be in bed. My constituents are worried and they ask me to write them a letter. Now, I do not do that very often, but I have written a letter to whom it may concern to vouch that a visitor is genuine. I do not know if that was the wrong thing to do, and I trust that the Minister of State will clarify that for me.

When I make representations, what case am I supposed to answer when I am told that a person is not a genuine visitor? I do not know what has happened in the interview at the airport and I do not know why the immigration officer has turned the entrant down. What I do know is that there have been umpteen cases when the immigration officer has been wrong. Why can I not have some account of the interview, and know why the immigration officer has said that the visitor is bogus or wrong? I would then know what case there was to answer. I hope that the Minister of State can comment on that.

Mr. Bob Edwards (Wolverhampton South-East): I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) is aware that I have two visitors in my constituency who came to this country to attend weddings and meet relatives. One of those visitors has been in detention for four weeks at public expense and the other for three weeks. I cannot get any reply or justification for that state of affairs from the Home Office.

Mr. Leighton: That sort of situation causes terrible aggravation and hardship for individuals and aggravation for Members of Parliament. It disgraces this country and it is uncivilised and barbarous. There should be more immigration officers to deal with these matters, and the Home Office must make some changes. We cannot carry on in the present way and I ask the Minister of State if I may have an extra worker from the Home Office to work for me to deal with the problems caused in my constituency by the Minister's Department.

8.58 pm

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): I would like to join in the warm tributes that have been paid this afternoon to the Minister of State and his staff. I would also like to welcome the guidelines, for the benefit that they accord not just to ourselves as hon. Members, but to the bulk of the minority communities who wish to abide by our laws and who wish to dissociate themselves from the malpractice that clearly exists.

The guidelines are needed as a protection for the basic tolerance and good nature of this country. Sustaining that tolerance and preserving our tradition of sanctuary must not be undermined by the activities of the few hon. Members and those outside the House whose motives are, to put it mildly, somewhat questionable and give cause for concern.

The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) said earlier that we do not prevent people coming to this country from the United States. He is absolutely correct. If a visitor comes from New York, whether he is white, Hispanic or coal-black, we hand him back his American passport and say, "Have a nice day." We do that because there is no inward pressure for settlement from the United States and that is why it is wrong for the hon. Member to argue in that manner. We discussed that pressure in May of last year and that was challenged by Opposition Members and there was talk of the repeal of legislation. We heard that talk again today. There could be nothing more damaging to existing and future good community relationships than the dismantling of existing controls.

In the May debate, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) spoke of only a handful of thousands awaiting the right of settlement. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman read the article in The Sunday Times last week about a group of entry clearance officers. The article was entitled

"The little white ghetto of Gulshan".

A queue of 11,600 people were awaiting clearance. This week, the Select Committee on Home Affairs was told that there were 30,000 dependants of Bangladeshis living in Tower Hamlets seeking admission. If that is a handful of thousands, it is a very big handful. Refugees and those seeking asylum are one thing, but people merely wanting to live here are entirely different. Because of these pressures, I believe that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is right to bring in these guidelines as a means of helping the peaceful integration of those minority groups who are already here and recognise the dangers of further inward pressure for settlement.

Last time I made these remarks, I received letters from what I called the Nottingham race relations industry. They were very instructive. They make my points for me. For example, the Transport and General Workers Union referred to "poisonous comments"; the National Union of Teachers said that my remarks were "ill-informed and potentially inflammatory"; the Inland Revenue Staff Federation spoke of "scant regard for people involved with the problem"; the Communist party of Great Britain referred to a "serious slur"; the Nottingham Inter-Union Race Relations Group said "inept and dismissive"; and the Pakistan Friends League spoke of "thousands of black people facing burocratic obstruction. We seek a more positive and generous" and so on. The prospective parliamentary candidate for the Labour party in my seat of Nottingham, South, referring to the rights of black people to live in this country, asked:

"Where was the evidence of pressure to immigrate."

If he and those other correspondents cannot see that evidence, they are either blind to the problem or do not, for whatever reason, want to see it.

I believe that, in the context of what we seek to achieve, these are reasonable guidelines. However, I am a little disappointed that there is no reference in them to encouraging — I asked for no more than that — hon. Members to check with immigration officers before making representations. If an hon. Member has made an inquiry and is satisfied that there is a reasonable case to put to the Minister, I am sure that he will put the case to the Minister. If the information that the hon. Member receives does not lead him to feel that there is a case to put, it is reasonable for him to tell the Home Office that he does not intend to make representations. There is no doubt in my mind or in the minds of many other hon. Members that the shopping around technique applies.

Stabilo Boss is a marvellous modern invention because it isolates the nub of paragraph 19. I marked out the words

"If there is clear evidence that a Member . . . advises him to travel without entry clearance on the presumption that . . .he will gain access . . . on temporary admission . . . then temporary admission will not readily be granted."

Paragraph 19 does not seek to avoid the kind of guidance an hon Member can give to his constituents—for example, the letters of identification to which many hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler), have referred and which I have given to relatives of people when I have known the family background and have been satisfied that the intended visitor would be a visitor and that production of a letter would avoid embarrassment at the port of entry.

In short, if these guidelines allow hon. Members to act fairly and justly on behalf of their constituents—I agree that our constituents are the sponsors, not the visitors—they are right and should work. The original draft contained one phrase, which relates to paragraph 19, to the effect that we must not allow temporary admission to be used as a device. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House have been embarrassed to find that temporary admission had been used as a device, even by people whom they thought they knew. If we give the guidelines a chance, if we try to make them as public as we can among the communities in which we deal day by day and if we take them in the spirit of good faith intended by Ministers, these problems will rapidly diminish.

9.4 pm

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): I apologise Mr. Speaker, for not being here at the beginning of the debate, but I wrote to you explaining the reason.

My concern here is that these guidelines seem to be setting the convenience of Ministers and immigration officials above the rights of hon. Members. Justice is being lost and the rights of Members' constituents are being denied. The person who is held may very well not be a constituent, but his relations who intervene and are the sponsors are our constituents. In these days when people hark back to Victorian values, it should be remembered that the Victorians gave some weight to the family and family life. This is of no less importance for an Indian or Pakistani than for a Britisher with a white skin.

My concern about these guidelines is, above all, that I know from the Asian community in my constituency how they are being interpreted. One person in Bolton said to me—he was not criticising—that it is rather tragic that Her Majesty is working so hard to cement the Commonwealth and the rules and regulations that the Government are producing seem to be dividing rather than uniting.

I would say to the Minister that if there is all this burden of work on his Department there is a simple solution. He admits, when questioned, that the people who come in to visit their relations in virtually every case abide by the agreement to leave the country. Why is it, if these people are such a danger, that when an hon Member intervenes they are allowed to be released and they leave at the time stated? Why, then, should they be detained in the first place? It does not happen to South Africans or Americans, and as they are leaving and are merely visitors there is no question of settlement.

These are the things that worry my constituents, because it is not an impartial law; it is a partial law. It depends on one's country of origin and it appears in some cases to depend on the ethnic group to which one belongs. The Minister's argument is that there are these terrible Members who are breaching the conventions and it is not for Ministers to police them. It certainly is not. I would regard that as a violation of privilege. It is for the House to deal with conventions.

Let us remember that when hon. Members deal with other hon. Members' constituents it is not in the immigration area alone, and not all the Members are members of the Labour party. Does that mean that education is going to provide guidelines, that industry is going to provide guidelines? Are we going to change the whole system when, even on the Government's own estimates, very few people break the rules, if indeed the rules are being broken?

Presumably, what will happen now is that if I am on holiday abroad and I am not here to intervene on behalf of my constituents, they will lose their rights. This concerns me very much. Does this also mean that the hon. and learned Gentleman will now release the instructions given to immigration officers by the Home Office? I have asked several times for this and the answer has been no.

Has the Minister—this is a reasonable question—tried to contact the immigration service other than as a Minister? It takes me an awfully long time to do so, and if I am expected to do it for something like 20,000 Asians who are British and who may have families here, it is going to take even more time. Is the Department going to accept a reversed-charge call from Cyprus, for instance, because, if nobody can represent my constituents when I am out of the country, I must do it? Will the Minister pay for that, or is this merely a device to divert attention from the Department and to make the system so cumbersome that hon. Members will not have the right to represent their constituents? My constituents and I are deeply worried, and that concern is not confined simply to the Asian community. In the British system of government, people look for their freedom.

9.9 pm

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Many hon. Members who have spoken have described the guidelines in the most virulent terms, as an attack on the rights of immigrants and visitors. However, they skirted round the guidelines themselves and failed to explain why they found them so objectionable.

During the past seven years I have made representations on behalf of many hundreds of constituents, and I cannot think of a single case in which I would have found these guidelines a hindrance. Moreover, I do not believe that any of my constituents on whose behalf I have made representations have found me wanting in my actions on their behalf.

I wish to make only one brief point as time is extremely short. The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) spoke about what one could reasonably describe as a type of charade in which hon. Members are involved. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) said that temporary admission was sometimes used as a device. One must accept that that is frequently the case. Even the report of the immigration and nationality department in 1984 said:

"temporary admission goes some way towards taking the sting out of a decision to refuse admission on arrival."

Would it not be possible to introduce a new sort of admission, perhaps restricted admission, which requires the entrant to stay at the address of the sponsor where he is known to be and from where he will be required to leave after a period of, perhaps, two months? In that way, the uncertainty would be taken out of the issue, and he would not be expected to leave at four or five days' notice when a reply is received from the Minister. Because the number of those who abscond is so small, that solution may be acceptable to all concerned. I appreciate that there would be a new problem in that the individual would have been granted some sort of admission, but I hope that that could be overcome.

We should reconsider the immigration rules, keep them under review and see how we can make them fairer. However, these guidelines can only help with the implementation of the rules. They are to the advantage, certainly of hon. Members, and, ultimately, of those who depend on them.

9.12 pm

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Today's debate on the guidelines that the Home Secretary has devised for Members of Parliament must be seen, and has been seen rightly by many hon. Members, in the context of our overall immigration policy. If there were not so much concern and anxiety about many aspects of the way in which the Immigration Act 1971 and immigration rules are being implemented, there would not have been so much anxiety about the guidelines. That is not to say that we would not have been critical of them, but the measure of our concern is reflected widely throughout the country.

In case there is any misunderstanding I wish to emphasise, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) did earlier, that the Labour party believes in immigration controls, but without a racial or sexual bias. We are concerned about the guidelines because they come from a Government who have said on more than one occasion that their intention in immigration policy is to keep the numbers down. That theme has underlined many, but not all, of the speeches of Tory Members this evening. Guidelines which are intended to further a policy to keep numbers down, regardless of the needs, considerations and rights of individuals, must be suspect. In the main we are talking not about people coming in for settlement, but almost entirely about visitors, and some hon. Members were not clear about the difference between the two. This Government have a history of trying to limit hon. Members' rights in immigration cases, but they have never gone as far as they have in these guidelines.

Some figures were quoted about the number of refused passengers represented by Members of Parliament. I have looked at the figures and tried to understand them in the light of the Home Secretary's speech. Not all the figures for 1985 are to hand, but the figures made available to us so far show that between 1983 and 1984 the number of refused passengers represented by Members of Parliament increased by about 1,000. At the same time, the number of persons refused entry increased by 3,500. Whatever the Home Secretary says about an enormous increase in the number of representations by Members of Parliament, they are a reflection of the total number of people refused entry.

One other possible reason why more Members of Parliament are approached is that the minority communities are, happily, becoming increasingly aware of their rights. It is a sign of their greater involvement as people whose future is in Britain that they come to Members of Parliament and ask us to act on their behalf when they want members of their families to come along.

There is another side to the Home Secretary's argument about increasing pressure and a need for guidelines. Not all the pressure is increasing. The figures about outstanding appeals against all refusals in connection with immigration show that in December 1980 nearly 16,000 appeals were outstanding. By December 1984 the figure was under 10,000. Whatever else may be said, there is some sign of a diminution of pressure on Home Office resources in aspects of the immigration problem other than the one that directly concerns Members of Parliament.

In 1981, 1,057 people appealed against court refusals. Last year the figure was down to 681. The Home Secretary suggested that there is increasing pressure all along the line, but that is not true because in some areas there is less pressure. One of the reasons for our anxiety is that the guidelines tell us how to do our jobs on behalf of our constituents. Why should the Home Office, alone of all the Departments, be doing that? If the Home Office was keen to be helpful to Members of Parliament it would have included in the guidelines things that are not in the guidelines. For example, it would be helpful, if one were going this path, to say that Members of Parliament should let the Home Secretary know when facts that are not known and cannot be taken into account if a case goes to appeal, come to light. I could give other examples, but if the guidelines are to operate as the Home Secretary suggests that might have been a better way to go. I prefer not to go down the path of the guidelines.

I repeat what many of my hon. and right hon. Friends have said, that many of us do not like handling immigration cases. They are time-consuming and difficult and arise at all hours of the day and night. We do them, though we often regret the necessity and the pressure on us, because that is the only way we can achieve justice for our constituents.

I also support the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) and I will give some evidence to support it. He said he had a suspicion, but to me it is a fact, that immigration officers refuse visitors in the knowledge that Members of Parliament may well take up the case, that the person will then get seven or eight weeks in Britain, and that the Minister of State will uphold the immigration officer's refusal. That was certainly said to me on a recent visit to Heathrow. As an immigration officer at Heathrow airport said to me, "Everybody therefore should be happy. Members of Parliament have got what they want. Visitors are allowed in. The refusal is upheld." That is absolutely absurd. I have told the Minister of State before, and I repeat it in good faith——

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman must be careful about what he says. He is not saying, is he, that the immigration officer refused entry because this person was going to be granted temporary admission?

Mr. Dubs: I do not want to put words into the mouth of an immigration officer. I am arguing against the way in which some immigration officers behave. If the Government are willing to distort the way in which they approach intending visitors——

Mr. Waddington: I did not say that.

Mr. Dubs: The Minister says that he did not say that. If I have to repeat what was said to me, I am happy to do so. The immigration officer said to me that, knowing that Members of Parliament are likely to take up these cases, he was more likely to put down a refusal, knowing that in the end the Member of Parliament would get that person in on temporary admission. That is absurd, but the absurdity starts at the point of entry—Heathrow airport. It does not start with Members of Parliament. It is not an argument against the stop system. It is an argument that immigration control, particularly as regards visitors, should be applied fairly and properly.

Mr. Bidwell: This raises the absurdity of a two-day temporary admission to give time for the Member of Parliament to intervene. If the Government are prepared to risk giving a couple of days of liberty to people who come to the United Kingdom, why cannot they be provided with a decent form of admission?

Mr. Dubs: That is precisely the point. That is why some hon. Members have serious doubts about this proposal.

When the guidelines were first mooted, I wondered why it was thought to be necessary to introduce them. I have before me a circular from the Immigration Service Union that was sent to members of the union on 14 November 1985. I want to refer to two points that are contained in the circular. It refers to "the problems caused by uncontrolled representation by Members of Parliament."

[Mr. Dubs]

The circular also says:

"The ISU delegation welcomed these developments and undertook to supply a list of the types of cases which the union considered as having no proper place in the system of MPs' representations."

Perhaps I am a little naive, but I am wondering whether the pressure that came from this particular source resulted in the decision of the Home Secretary and the Minister of State to act as they did. I understand that the original suggestion that all representations by Members of Parliament should go through chief immigration officers has been dropped because those who work in the immigration service realised that it would place a great deal of additional work upon their shoulders. Many hon. Members warned some time ago that that would happen. Despite the fact that the Home Secretary has climbed down by responding to the many criticisms and significantly toning down the guidelines compared with the original version, they contain a number of features to which many hon. Members on both sides of the House still object.

The Home Secretary said originally that it was necessary for Members of Parliament to approach chief immigration officers. We were concerned about this, both in principle and in practice. It represented a major departure from the principle that hon. Members have the right of direct access to Ministers. For this purpose access to the private offices of Ministers is the same as access to Ministers. It was not a fair approach to say to Members of Parliament that the analogy of Department of Health and Social Security officers in their dealings with members of the public should be used. When we take up immigration cases are we supposed to be advocates on behalf of our constituents or do we adopt a quasi-judicial function?

Some have argued that Members should approach the chief immigration officers rather than the Minister to obtain all the background information. Part of that argument is that Members of Parliament should act in a quasi-judicial role. For the life of me I cannot see how we can be expected to do that. It would be against the whole basis of many of the representations that Members take up on behalf of constituents on a whole range of subjects.

We are simply not able to judge for and against the admission of a person into a country. All we can do is to satisfy ourselves that there are reasonable grounds for that individual to be admitted. It is not necessarily the case that a long chat with the chief immigration officer would change the basis on which we make representation to the Minister. That also assumes that there is time to go to the chief immigration officer. Members of Parliament who take up visitor cases do so with good will and in the belief that there is a reasonably good case for that visitor to be admitted. It is not a matter of a quasi-judicial function but it is a matter of Members acting as advocates.

I wish that the guidelines had said that the time limits were advisory. In most cases it is reasonable that they should be adhered to and we seek to do that. However, there are times when that is difficult. That is especially true with the four-day and five-day limits set out in paragraph 9 and 14 respectively. It may not be possible to reach a constituent on the telephone. Also, the post is not that good. If any of us are away for a day or two we simply cannot get word to our constituent in time. It is proper that our constituents should be able to hear from us before a further decision about their future or about a relative's future is made by the Home Office.

The vexed argument whether Members should be utterly confined to taking up cases within their constituencies has taken up more time than anything else. The practice of my colleagues and myself is that we do put on stops on behalf of colleagues who may be away, ill or difficult to reach. There are also incidents when we may put on these stops on behalf of a Conservative Member of Parliament if that Member cannot be found, to enable the visitor to stay in the country long enough to ensure that the Member of Parliament can consider whether he or she wishes to make a representation on the visitor's behalf.

There is also the case where Members have a specialist interest, and that is acknowledged in the new version of the guidelines. However, some Members of Parliament bluntly refuse to take on immigration cases. What are we to do? There are two conventions which collide. One convention is the exclusive relationship of constituents to one Member of Parliament but the other convention is that everyone has basic rights. If those basic rights are ignored for whatever reason by a Member of Parliament, who is to say that that individual should not go to another Member and say, "I have basic rights. Help me to achieve those rights." That is the nub of the argument.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Change the sponsor.

Mr. Dubs: It is not as simple as that. Often there is no time to do that. When we are approached it is sometimes better, in the interest of the constituent or the person, to say that we will make a representation to the Home Office on their behalf.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I would not disagree with anything that the hon. Member has said. However, there is a problem regarding representation and we have to address ourselves to it. Does he not agree that there is a problem of "shopping around" and that if one could solve that problem it would be better?

Mr. Dubs: I do not agree at all that there is a problem of shopping around.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: We have one.

Mr. Dubs: I do not have that problem. I simply get people desperate that representations should be made but unable to find, perhaps on a Saturday evening, the Member they are looking for.

Mr. Corbyn: Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a further problem with the guidelines as proposed by the Minister? If a Member of Parliament refuses to take up immigration cases, for perverse reasons or out of prejudice, and the individual then goes to a Member who is prepared to take up the case, the Home Office proposes to copy the correspondence to the original Member who either flatly refused to take up the case or whose reputation makes him unlikely to be approached by people with immigration problems because they know the prejudice on which he operates.

Mr. Dubs: My hon. Friend anticipates my next point. In my view, it is improper for the Home Secretary to suggest in the guidelines that if a Member becomes involved in a case in another constituency the correspondence should be copied to the Member for that constituency. We are approached on a confidential basis, sometimes precisely because the person is unhappy about going to the Member of Parliament in that constituency. We should respect that confidentiality and the Home Office should also respect it.

It may be a matter of embarrassment for the Home Secretary, but the views of one or two Conservative Back Benchers are such that the ethnic minority communities regard those Members as extremely hostile and would not want private information to be sent to them. It is therefore wrong for the Home Secretary to suggest in the guidelines that that information should be made available. If it is made available with permission, that is all right, but to make it available just like that is inappropriate and unsatisfactory.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that very few Conservative Members actually refuse to take cases? A number of others, however, may decide when they get a case that there is no substance in it. It is in those circumstances that we object to the individual going to another Member.

Mr. Dubs: There may be few, but there are certainly some, and we must be as concerned about people in those Members' constituencies as about people in our own constituencies.

One or two Conservative Members have referred to visas. In Bangladesh the current failure rate for visa applications is 30 per cent. People voluntarily apply for visas — there is no need to do so because they could simply arrive at Heathrow as Commonwealth citizens. The refusal rate at United Kingdom ports for people from Bangladesh is about 2 per cent. There must be some reason for the difference. Moreover, as the Minister will confirm, the success rate in appeals against the 30 per cent. refusals is about 50 per cent. A disturbingly high refusal rate in Bangladesh is suggested by the difference between the refusal rates in Bangladesh and at United Kingdom ports as well as by the high success rate of appeals against refusals in Bangladesh.

The cost of a visa regime would be enormous. An entry certificate officer costs the Home Office about £50,000 whereas an immigration officer based here costs about £15,000. The introduction of a visa system in the sub-continent would involve enormous difficulties, of principle as well as of cost and of practice.

I share the concern of those hon. Members, mainly my hon. Friends, who have referred to paragraph 19 of the guidelines about the consequences of hon. Members giving advice to people in their constituencies who wish to have visitors. Although the wording is now different from the original version, it still suggests that hon. Members are not behaving properly and that somehow we are conniving at getting into the country people who would not be admissible under the rules. It becomes a matter of subjective judgment in the end. The way the guidelines are worded still implies that the friends and relatives of constituents are to be penalised if our constituents have sought advice from us. I hope that the Home Secretary will think again about that because it is pernicious and wrong.

The hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Whitfield) attacked the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short). That attack went too far. The hon. Gentleman was not right to say about my hon. Friend what he said. Her speech was good; it was honest and reflected what many of us and the majority of people think. For the hon. Gentleman to cast such a slur on my hon. Friend was uncalled for and absolutely wrong.

In the debate we are not talking mainly about whether hon. Members should be helped to have easier or more difficult jobs, although that is a consideration which matters to us; what we are essentially concerned with are the rights of people here to have their relatives and friends come to stay with them as visitors. That is a basic right. The hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis), who is connected with the tourist industry, made a speech which suggested that he was totally against tourism to this country, if I understood correctly what he said. Yet he has two entries in "The Times Guide" which suggest that he is busy in the tourist industry when he is not in the House.

The right to have one's friends and relatives come here as visitors is basic. We all want our friends from abroad to come here as visitors. We should not deny that right to some people because of the colour of their skin. In the end that is at the heart of the guidelines. That is why we are against them and why I want the House to vote against them tonight.

9.37 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): This has been a good-tempered debate. I am grateful to right hon. and hon. Members for the points they have made. This was a difficult nettle to grasp. Hon. Members are naturally jealous of their rights and privileges and they are quick to react if they think that those rights and privileges are being infringed. I do not think many hon. Members really believe that we can leave things just as they are. There was an increase in representations by hon. Members in port cases alone from 1,000 in 1982 to 5,700 in 1985. The score in 1986 is likely to be at the very least 7,000.

Mr. Leighton: Why?

Mr. Waddington: Those figures relate just to port cases. Total representations were over 16,000 last year and no doubt will be higher this year. I want to make these points because obviously they have not gone home to certain Opposition Members in view of the sedentary intervention which was made just a moment ago. Immigration officers apply exactly the same rules now for visitors as they did when Labour was in power.

Ms. Clare Short: How do they interpret them?

Mr. Waddington: They operate them under precisely the same instructions and in precisely the same way. Taken as a percentage of total passenger traffic, refusals of people from the Indian sub-continent are few and far between. Of all passengers, 99·8 per cent. are admitted; of passengers from the Indian sub-continent, 99 per cent. are admitted.

The increase in representations cannot be accounted for by the increase in traffic or by the increase in refusals. I remind hon. Members of some key figures. In 1982 just over 12,000 people were refused entry; in 1983, 13,900. That was an increase of 14 per cent. Between 1983 and 1984 there was an increase of 24 per cent. in refusals but between 1982 and 1983, against an increase in traffic of 10 per cent. and an increase of refusals of 14 per cent., there was an increase in representations by hon. Members of no less than 150 per cent.

Hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Leighton: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Waddington: Between 1983 and 1984, against an increase in traffic of 13 per cent. and an increase in refusals of 24 per cent., there was a 40 per cent. increase in representations by hon. Members.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Leighton rose——

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Waddington: I should go on.

Mr. Corbyn: When the hon. and learned Gentleman refers to the total number of passengers arriving from the sub-continent, could he make it clear whether he means all passengers of whatever nationality or passengers from India, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh or Pakistan? Having done so, I think that the hon. and learned Gentleman would be forced to concede that a far higher proportion of nationals of the sub-continent are refused than of the total figure of arrivals from those places.

Mr. Waddington: The figures that I have given are correct. When we talk of passengers from the Indian sub-continent, we mean Pakistan, Bangladesh and India. The figures for Sri Lanka are not included.

There are those enormous figures——

Mr. Leighton rose——

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Waddington: I will not give way. I was left very little time. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) spoke for twice as long as the Home Secretary and the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) spoke for longer than he should have.

In the face of those figures, it seems extraordinary that the right hon. Gentleman should ask why the guidelines are needed at all. The right hon. Gentleman said that the present system works satisfactorily.

Mr. Leighton rose——

Mr. Waddington: That was an extraordinary statement. It is extraordinary, too, that we should be told that in too many cases things go wrong. Our staff do their level best to prevent things going wrong but with the pressure of the system to which the enormous increase in representations contributes——

Mr. Straw: Why?

Mr. Waddington: I will not give way.

With that pressure, it is surprising that things do not go wrong more often. Immigration officers are spending much of their time writing letters to hon. Members—or to me, to send to hon. Members. Some of those hon. Members have put a stop on a case and taken no further action at all. The immigration officers would be far better employed clearing passengers through the controls without delay.

The burgeoning of the practice of putting stops on cases has other undesirable effects. First of all, the control is undermined. Because of the pressure of work and the very generous policy of temporary admission, a person who does not qualify to enter gets into the country anyhow. The hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) made a joke of that, but it is a serious matter. People who do not qualify for entry get into the country all the same and can then stay for as long as they would have been entitled to stay if they had been granted leave to enter.

That state of affairs is not satisfactory. It occurs for two reasons. The first is that we are generous about temporary admission and allow people into the country instead of keeping them in detention as we could. Secondly, as a result of the increase in representations by Members of Parliament and the pressure of work on the immigration service, it is taking longer to deal with those cases than it did some years ago.

Another undesirable effect is that people who do not get temporary admission — luckily they are a minority because of the generous policy pursued — are kept in custody for longer than any of us would wish, again because of the pressure put on the system. No Labour Member would want that to continue.

The third unfortunate effect of all this is that the country is having to pay more and more in the way of the passage costs of people who have eventually to be removed——

Ms. Clare Short rose——

Mr. Waddington: —but who are not removed during the period when the cost falls upon the immigration service.

Ms. Short: The Minister is misleading the House.

Mr. Waddington: There has been a real——

Ms. Short: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The reason the country pays to return passengers is because the Minister——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must make a point of order, not a point of disagreement.

Ms. Short: Is the Minister allowed to mislead the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Nobody misleads the House. The Minister makes his own speech.

Mr. Waddington: If the hon. Lady will be patient, I shall get on to something which she said and I am sure that she will wish to intervene at that stage.

There has been a real process of consultation. We revised the original draft guidelines in the light of what was said. It is a pity that a number of hon. Members did not like the proposal that an hon. Member should approach the port to put on a stop, but we have accepted the views of a large number of hon. Members on that. I am sure that on reflection Labour Members will not cavil at the fact that we listened to what hon. Members said. I should have thought that that was the object of a consultation exercise such as this.

We are not trying to force anything down the throats of hon. Members. We are merely informing hon. Members how we intend to operate the system. It must operate. It is in the interests of all hon. Members that it should be operated. We must make the system work and that is why we have presented the guidelines to the House.

I shall not dwell for long on the speech made by the right hon. Member for Gorton, but he made a particularly nasty attack on the immigration service. In doing so he ignored the Commission for Racial Equality report which concluded that decisions made by immigration officers were not motivated by racism. He ignored entirely the report of the Select Committee on Home Affairs and its unanimous conclusion that the staff of the immigration and nationality department deserved commendation, not criticism. It was a grossly unfair attack and it was a completely ignorant attack because the right hon. Gentleman cannot have bothered to investigate any of these reports to which I have referred.

Some hon. Members, including the right hon. Member for Gorton, have failed to recognise that there is more pressure to immigrate from some parts of the world than others. That is why there is a difference in refusal rates for visitors in the case of people seeking entry from some parts of the world compared with people seeking entry from other parts of the world.

Labour Members were quick to make political points this afternoon about refusal of entry statistics. But it is worth bearing in mind that if one looks, for instance, at refusals of people seeking entry as visitors from Pakistan in 1978 and compares that with people from Pakistan refused entry in 1984, one will find precisely the same percentage. I am slightly wrong. It is 1·1 per cent. in one case and 1·3 per cent. in the other. One should be very careful about quoting refusal rates.

A very silly comment was made about the present system working well. It is not working as well as it should do. But the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) complimented the staff of my private office, and I am grateful to him for doing so. I should like to compliment them myself, as they work marvellously in a very difficult job. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne) stood alone in the House when he made a disgraceful remark about racism in the Minister's office. He stood alone in that, as all hon. Members who take such matters seriously know how well my staff work and the service that they give to hon. Members. Some hon. Members made unsavoury allegations about racism and the immigration service. I repeat what I said earlier about the conclusions of the CRE report.

The hon. Member for Southall called for a right of appeal in this country for visitors refused entry, and took up the theme raised yesterday by the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) in his ten-minute Bill. But in making a decision about such matters one has to look at the administrative burden and at the difficulty of removing people within a reasonable time scale after they have gone through the appeal system. The whole appeal system can be spun out for a long time as Members of Parliament know from dealing with constituents who have become wrapped up in appealing against a refusal to extend their stay. When people exercise a right of appeal in this country and are turned down by the adjudicator and then by the immigration appeals tribunal, they are not slow to go to their Members of Parliament and to get them to come to me. Consequently, I am by no means confident that, if we had a right of appeal in this country, there would be less pressure on the Minister's office.

Mr. Bidwell: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Waddington: I shall not give way, as I have little time left and there are important matters to deal with.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) mentioned keeping passports. I shall repeat what was said to him by Opposition Members. If anyone wants his passport back, he has only to ask for it. I cannot for a moment believe that the hon. Gentleman has evidence of someone having a decision made against him because he had previously asked for his passport back. Many strange things happen, but I am sure that that has never happened.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) mentioned two cases in which she was involved. Of course, I shall not go into the facts of them. However, in paragraph 19 of the guidance we are talking about people being invited here when the Member of Parliament concerned knows that they are not entitled to enter. The Member of Parliament may know that the person could obtain legal entry to this country only as a result of obtaining entry clearance abroad, and that the person has not done so. If a Member of Parliament told a person that he should come anyhow, even though he would be refused because the Member of Parliament would apply for temporary admission, the vast majority of hon. Members would say that that was wrong. Surely everyone would agree that that would be a very odd way of using the privilege to put on a stop——

Ms. Short: Now may I ask my question?

Mr. Waddington: Yes.

Ms. Short: The hon. and learned Gentleman is completely wrong. As he knows, a Commonwealth citizen is entitled either to apply for an entry certificate for a visit or to come without one. I told someone who had been refused, not because of the rules but because of the prejudiced way in which they were interpreted, that he was legally entitled to come here without an entry certificate and that I would assist if he was then refused. That is absolutely in accordance with the law. What the Minister just said is wrong in law and in fact.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Lady doth protest too much.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) asked that the time limits be flexibly enforced. We all have to be sensible about that. I recognise that, however carefully we draft guidelines of this sort, one will find exceptional cases. I can tell hon. Members that it is the intention of the Home Office to try to operate the guidelines sensibly. I think that the feeling of the House tonight was that it is about time we spelt out what ought to be a reasonable time in which to make representations; otherwise cases can go on and on.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) made some interesting points. I shall look into his point about interpreters using direct speech and about too much attention being paid to lies. However, I suspect that it is difficult to ignore the fact that a person has exercised deception when one is asked to decide whether a person is telling the truth when he says that he only wants to enter the country for a short visit and will then return abroad. My hon. and learned Friend said that he would act responsibly under the new guidelines. I am sure that that is what he will do and that that is the wish and the intention of all hon. Members who have been present during the debate. I am sure that we can make the new system work.

My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) said that the misuse of a system to make representations can disadvantage genuine visitors. I am sure that that is true and we should continue to make that point as hard as we can. If we have pressure on the system, such as we have, it can obviously lead to delays at the ports, which could otherwise have been avoided.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler) said that he thought it was a pity we left out the provision about approaching the ports. I think that it would have been helpful to hon. Members to be able to hear the reasons for the refusal at first hand from a senior immigration officer. I realise that it would have involved hon. Members in more work and some expense in telephoning the port concerned. However, I do not accept that any issues of constitutionality were involved, because it is plain that when a person puts on a stop now he is not asking me to exercise any discretion. He is merely ringing my private office and asking it to relay a message to the ports. It is an automatic process which has nothing to do with the hon. Member's right of access to the Minister. That point was completely bogus. However, I can see that hon. Members would have been faced with more work and they already have an enormous amount of work to do in constituencies with a large ethnic minority community.

There has been a misunderstanding about the time limit of only four days after I have rejected a submission by an hon. Member to reverse the decision made by an immigration officer. In fact, we work on four days now. We do that as a courtesy to hon. Members so that we can make absolutely sure that they will receive the letter from me saying that I have rejected their submission before the person who is going to have to return abroad is told by the immigration service. Therefore, there is nothing to worry about there.

On the matter of poaching, I would merely say that I understand the anxiety which has been expressed by some hon. Members. However, I have to tell hon. Members that they may not have a clear idea of the aggravation that has to be borne by my staff who are faced with angry Members from both sides of the House.

PETITIONS

Shops Bill

10.13 pm

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I beg leave to present the following petition:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The humble petition of residents of Newark Constituency sheweth that the undersigned are opposed to the provision for unlimited Sunday Trading in the Shops Bill currently before Parliament, recognising that Sunday has special characteristics as a day of rest, recreation and worship for the benefit of our family and community life.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House do maintain legal limitations on Sunday Trading to ensure that the special character of Sunday is protected.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

Father Timothy O'Sullivan of the Holy Trinity church is the leading signatory to the petition, which was signed by 1,160 of my constituents. The petition reflects the concern of many of my constituents. I have pleasure in presenting it on their behalf.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I present this petition of behalf of some 2,000 signatories in my constituency of Teignbridge. The terms of the petition are that they are opposed to the provision of unlimited Sunday trading under the Shops Bill at present before Parliament, recognising that Sunday has substantial characteristics as a day of rest, recreation and worship, to the benefit of our family and community life.

This is a substantial petition. The principal organisers, as I understand it, were a Mr. and Mrs. Holding of Teignmouth in my constituency. They are to my knowledge local Baptists and I recognise many of the signatures to this petition as those of Baptists who have spoken to me at least at one meeting.

I think that it is fair that I say of those people who asked me to present the petition on their behalf that I can entirely understand their motives, aspirations and hopes. The only way in which I differ from them is in that, although I understand their fears, I feel that they are misplaced. Having said that, the depth of concern that they felt in presenting this petition to me was entirely evident and it is certainly no hardship to present it in that light.

The conclusion of the petition reads:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Honourable House do maintain legal limitations on Sunday trading to ensure that the special character of Sunday is protected.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Arms Control (Verification)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

10.16 pm

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): I am pleased to initiate this important debate, because we all have an interest in peace. There can be no dispute that arms control, particularly in respect of nuclear weapons, has a major part to play in achieving greater global security and prolonged peace. Verification is an essential part of that process. As was pointed out in the United Kingdom working paper of 1 August 1983 to the Committee on Disarmament, entitled "Verification aspects of a Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty"

"What is at issue is the political will to recognise that the correct path towards an agreed Treaty—however long it may prove to be — leads through detailed considerations of verification issues. Once we are confident that those problems have been resolved — and the solution must not permit disequilibrium in international relationships by allowing one side to gain advantage over another—then we can move towards the final banning of all nuclear tests."

In that same document it was pointed out that verification is not detection alone but detection and identification.

The Government remain firmly committed to the pursuit of a verifiable comprehensive test ban and are actively working on the problems that remain in achieving one. This was reaffirmed as recently as 7 June 1985 in this House when my right hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Luce), then in the position now occupied by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) whom I welcome, not least as my mother's constituency Member, was replying to an Adjournment debate on a test ban treaty. He pointed out then that:

"We should be proud of the fact that Britain played a leading and distinctive role in the early 1960s, in drawing up the partial test ban treaty . . . Together with the United States and the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom participated fully from 1977 to 1980 in trilateral negotiations on a comprehensive test ban treaty . . . The United Kingdom has played a full and active part in . . . multilateral discussions at the Geneva conference on disarmament, where a nuclear test ban working group was established in 1982."

The United Kingdom tabled two working papers on "Peaceful Nuclear Explosions in Relation to a Nuclear Test Ban" and the paper to which I have already referred.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham said that the Government

"remain convinced of the value of further work in Geneva towards a comprehensive test ban".

We are committed to seeking progress towards it. During that debate he also said

"no test ban treaty can be truly worth pursuing which does not contain adequate safeguards of compliance by all its signatory parties."

that is a contention with which I agree. He also pointed out:

"we are not looking for perfect or 100 per cent. verification".—[Official Report, 7 June 1985, Vol. 80, c. 616-17.]

The whole House will know that of the non-proliferation treaty we are required to show that we are using our best endeavours to make progress towards nuclear disarmament, and the final declaration of the third review conference of the NPT, held in Geneva last August to September, called upon the United States, the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom to reconvene their trilateral negotiations on a comprehensive test ban treaty by the end of 1985.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, in a speech at Harrogate on 27 March 1982, said

"We want a Comprehensive Test Ban. Negotiations under that Committee (The Committee on Disarmament at the UN in Geneva), alas, are going far too slowly, but it remains this Government's objective."

Our commitment to a comprehensive test ban treaty is not unique. Yet, I believe that we have a particular role to play in acting as a catalyst and seeking to remove obstacles. Clearly, however, bearing in mind that we possess only about 3 per cent. of the world's nuclear weapons compared with 95 per cent. in the possession of the United States and the Soviet Union, we must look to agreement between the super powers, and the effect that we can have on it. Hon. Members may recall that in his written statement on 24 February 1986, President Reagan said,

"We are also pleased that the Soviet Union has indicated publicly that it now recognises our long-held position that verification of negotiated agreements is critical. We intend to pursue in specific terms at the negotiating table General Secretary Gorbachev's public offer to resolve any necessary verification issues."

Even more recently, on 6 March of this year Paul Nitze, special adviser to the President and Secretary of State on arms control matters, said that it was vitally necessary that any new arms control agreements incorporate stringent verification measures including measures more comprehensive and exacting than in any previous agreement. He welcomed implicit recognition of that point suggested in those parts of Mr. Gorbachev's public statement dealing with on-site inspection and other co-operative measures that may be necessary. Accordingly, Mr. Nitze stated, the United States intended to pursue Mr. Gorbachev's overture on verification. He spoke of the ultimate goal of a world committing the total elimination of nuclear weapons, and the fact that the new Soviet leadership tried to deal concretely with the problem of achieving a world free of nuclear weapons, or at least gave the appearance of doing so. He complained, nevertheless, that the Soviet proposal was front-loaded in that its first stage called for measures that would assure the USSR superiority in virtually all categories of military capability at the end of that stage, reserving for stages two and three things that could be of interest to the West, and leaving a number of the essential preconditions to the non-nuclear world wholly uncovered.

Almost exactly a month after the Adjournment debate last year to which I have referred, the Government submitted a paper to the conference on disarmament entitled "Seismic Monitoring for a Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban". This is a full and technical document dealing with the matter, and acknowledges that seismoligical methods offer the only practical long-range means of monitoring compliance with the treaty banning underground nuclear weapon test explosions. We should not forget that the limited test ban treaty which came into force in 1963 prohibited nuclear explosions in space, in the atmosphere and in the oceans, and there has been no serious objection raised to the monitoring of compliance with that treaty. The threshold test ban treaty was signed in 1974 between the United States and USSR limiting underground nuclear weapons tests to yields of 150 kilotons, and I have not heard of any difficulties in monitoring compliance with the specific nature of that treaty.

The United Kingdom's paper to the conference on disarmament states that a negotiated ban on underground nuclear testing would certainly demand setting up a global seismic network for monitoring at teleseismic ranges. How such a network would be provided has not been decided, although the activities of the ad hoc group of scientific experts appointed by the conference on disarmament suggest that parties to a treaty would contribute existing stations to the network. If that were the case the network would not be optimised from the technical point of view, the locations of stations would not be ideal for the global monitoring role, and the equipment at some stations would not be of the highest possible quality. It concludes that on the basis of data currently available it is estimated that a properly designed and deployed global network of seismic stations would achieve a detection threshold of a magnitude of four, and an identification threshold of a magnitude of four and a half throughout the world, which could enable nuclear tests with yields above a few tens of kilotonnes to be undiscovered. The paper concludes:

"At least for the present it appears that monitoring at teleseismic ranges by itself would be insufficiently effective to permit a test ban to be brought into force."

The most interesting section of the paper, however, is that which deals with high seismic frequencies, and paragraph 55 which states:

"It appears from the above that there are possibilies for test ban monitoring in observing higher seismic frequencies than have hitherto been considered. It will be necessary to demonstrate that high frequency signals can indeed be detected over a variety of source/receiver paths and to investigate whether the sources of detected high frequency signals can be identified as earthquakes or explosions with adequate assurance. If a high frequency programme was successful in these respects, there would be promise of at least a partial technical solution to the low yield and the decoupled explosion problems. However, for monitoring against low yield decoupled explosions, regional stations would certainly be required because the seismic magnitudes would be equivalent to a strongly coupled explosion of 200 tons or less."

One major obstacle to this advance in detection and identification has been removed by the Soviet Union reaffirming its position at the Geneva summit in November 1985 that it is prepared to have internal seismographic stations installed. In an interesting article in the Financial Times of 19 November 1985, Mr. David Fishlock in an article "Monitor to Beat Test Ban Cheating" wrote:

"If a complete test ban on nuclear explosions were ever agreed between the US and the Soviet Union the system could give the necessary assurance that neither was cheating. But first the Soviets would have to gain the kind of confidence the US is beginning to show in NORESS, its prototype seismic detector in Norway. The Norwegian Regional Seismic Array is a pattern of seismic detectors laid over a circular area of pine forest three kilometres across near Hamar, one hundred kilometres north of Oslo. The array of 25 seismometers detect and pinpoint the explosion. Regional seismometers overcome the objection about confusion between nuclear explosions and earthquakes. The differences are readily apparent in seismograms, but lessen with distance. Moreover, another objection to existing verification techniques, decoupling or the carrying out of explosions in caverns rather than in holes or in highly compressible ground so as to muffle to shock waves, can be spotted by NORESS. As NORESS has a range of about only 2,000 kilometres it will need to be located on Soviet as well as Western soil. Sandia National Laboratories in Albuquerque, New Mexico, thinks that arrays can be installed for about one million dollars each."

Verification requires that each nation has a reliable and objective means of monitoring the military activities of the other. In the debate on verification and in the interests of our goal of a comprehensive test ban treaty, we cannot rely on the evidence of yesterday. We must constantly review the technological advance of verification techniques which are being rapidly enhanced. Satellite and aerial photography, seismology, radar and radiation detection have been refined and improved since their introduction. New methods of infra-red sensors, image and data-processing techniques and synthetic aperture radar are available. Synthetic aperture radar enables the United States to monitor areas in the Soviet Union that are covered by clouds and are in daylight only for a few hours each day. It does not have great resolution but images can be computer-enhanced.

Advanced conventional radar based on land, sea or air, can easily track Soviet missile tests and is very reliable. Over-the-horizon radar is utilised by the United States. These devices project beams that the ionosphere which acts like a mirror and reflects into the interior of the USSR. Radar of this type also provides useful information about the velocity of the missile. Radio receivers on the ground and on high orbit satellites intercept the stream of messages that the missile during testing sends back to the ground and those messages describe the performance and conditions of the various parts of the missile.

The messages, known collectively as telemetry, include information on how much fuel is being burned, the commands that the guidance system is sending to the rocket, and the temperature and pressure that different parts of the missile are experiencing. All these signals are intercepted by US monitoring facilities. By correlating such telemetry data with information about the motion of the missile gathered by ground based radars, US intelligence officers know not only that the USSR has tested a missile, but also discover many of its performance characteristics.

These are means of gathering intelligence about missiles, but the means of monitoring underground tests are also highly advanced. A nuclear explosion is a point-like event that releases a huge amount of energy abruptly into the environment. The limited extent and the suddenness of such an event, force the device to release its energy in much shorter waves which have far higher frequencies than an earthquake, which is a widespread event. As a result, the waves from a nuclear explosion can be detected and recognised by their frequency characteristics even if they are accompanied by those of an earthquake.

The unmanned seismic stations which Sandia National Laboratories has devised have been tested, and there are now five such stations in the US and Canada for practice and demonstration purposes. These stations communicate constantly by satellite relay with a central control facility in the US, making them virtually tamperproof. The USSR has accepted a proposal for the emplacement of such stations on its soil during negotiations for a comprehensive test ban treaty. Consequently, there appears to be no technical obstacle to monitoring with great competence underground nuclear tests releasing as little as one kiloton or less of energy. These assertions need to be investigated critically and carefully. I hope that my hon. Friend will do so.

We are committed to a comprehensive test ban treaty. The United States House of Representatives has passed a motion calling upon the President to:

"Propose to the Soviet Union the immediate resumption of negotiations towards conclusion of a verifiable Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty."

The Soviet Union is prepared to have unmanned monitoring devices on its own territory and the United States Administration seeks the total elimination of nuclear weapons, yet that does not happen. I do not underestimate the problems associated with adequate verification, but these are capable of solution in the near future if not at the present time. Perhaps there is a need for a third party exerting influence. With the high international reputation that the United Kingdom enjoys, a reputation that has been enhanced under this Government, we are ideally suited to that task.

Six world leaders in the five continents peace initiative recently made an offer to Moscow and Washington to assume a direct role in the monitoring process of verification. The proposal grew out of the peace initiative presented by the six leaders in May 1984, a summit meeting of the leaders in New Delhi in January 1985, and scientific studies of nuclear test monitoring undertaken by US seismic experts. The leaders have said that they are ready to offer their good offices in order to facilitate the establishment of effective verification arrangements.

The violence and uncertainty of the world is manifested by the tragedy that one of those leaders, Indira Gandhi, was assassinated. Her son, Rajiv, has taken up his mother's mantle in this regard and pursued it with great energy. Another of those leaders was Mr. Olof Palme, tragically assassinated so recently. The five continents peace initiative has been sponsored by Parliamentarians Global Action, formerly Parliamentarians for World Order, of the international council which I have been privileged to be the chairman. A comprehensive test ban treaty will by itself not give greater global security. The potential use of nuclear weapons is not wholly inhibited by banning tests. The effectiveness of modern nuclear weapons can now be tested increasingly by computers without the need to rely on tests at all. We still need to find a system of international arbitrament of disputes which is universally acceptable and removes the need for possession of weapons of mass destruction. Only then will there be the capacity for prolonged peace but, as is acknowledged and pursued by this Government, a comprehensive test ban treaty is an important step forward. It is within reach if we are prepared to stretch out and grasp it.

10.30 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tim Renton): I should like to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) for the opportunity which his keen interest has given me to restate the Government's view on this important subject of verification in arms control. I should also like to thank him for complimenting the Government upon their commitment to the arms control process. I congratulate him, too, upon the extent of his technical knowledge that he has shown in the remarks that he has just addressed to the House.

My hon. Friend has joined other hon. Members in calling for the resumption of trilateral negotiations for a comprehensive test ban treaty, so it is timely that I should now restate clearly that the Government remain firmly and actively committed to the arms control and disarmament process, in which our aim is the strengthening of peace and security at lower levels of armaments and military expenditure.

However, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in her speech to the United Nations second special session on disarmament in 1982, verification is the heart of the matter, not an optional extra. It is an essential ingredient if any arms control agreement is genuinely to enhance stability and security. It is virtually impossible to achieve perfect verification. On the other hand, inadequate verification is unacceptable since it would undermine the very confidence which arms control agreements seek to promote. It is equally impossible to quantify in precise terms what level of verification would be acceptable for any particular arms control agreement.

The degree of verification required in each case will be a matter for considered political judgment, taking technical considerations into account. This judgment will include the extent of political confidence on one side that the other side will comply with the treaty in question. Effective verification and confidence have to go hand in hand.

To build this confidence we need to have satisfactory answers to some basic questions. For example, will undetected evasion of the agreement provide a significant military advantage? Will significant non-observance of the agreement be detected early enough, in time to allow the necessary counter-measures to be taken? Even if the evidence of such non-observance is available, will it be convincing enough to justify such counter-measures? And if we feel satisfied on these points, will we then have the ability to deter any temptation to depart from strict compliance with the agreement?

Arms control agreements, if they are to work, must therefore contain clear, unambiguous and effective provisions dealing with these questions and providing the maximum guarantee of strict compliance.

As my hon. Friend has just said, the Government remain fully committed to the goal of a verifiable, comprehensive test ban treaty. We see such a treaty as an important objective in our overall arms control policy, but we remain seriously concerned on the self-same score of verification. It is wrong to dismiss these concerns, as some do—though not my hon. Friend—in a cavalier fashion. Key security interests would be affected by any such treaty, and the risks created by undetected non-compliance would be especially grave.

There are at present inadequacies in our ability to detect and identify nuclear tests. Claims that these technical problems no longer exist, and can therefore be ignored, are simply not borne out by the scientific advice available to the Government. Wishful thinking on this key matter must not be allowed to over-ride impartial scientific analysis. Our experience of previous negotiations in this area suggests that these remaining problems will not be easily resolved; and against this background we consider it premature to resume negotiations until solutions become more apparent.

Let me explain our reservations. Seismology offers the most realistic prospect for verifying a comprehensive test ban treaty. Every year thousands of earthquakes occur which in seismic terms show similar characteristics to those of nuclear tests. When such events, and nuclear tests, occur above a certain level of seismic activity, we can detect them and we are confident that we can distinguish between them. At lower levels of seismic activity, we are less confident that we have the necessary ability both to detect and identify them correctly especially for small nuclear explosions. In the present state of the art our assessment is that the best which could be achieved is thresholds of detection and identification above the level at which militarily significant testing can occur.

Another argument is that the risks involved in this leakage are acceptable. We do not agree. Let us remember also that we know relatively little about the geological data of other possible testing sites, such data being essential for the accurate interpretation of seismic events. We may indeed be able to detect and identify high-yield tests conducted at sites whose geological features are familiar to us. Tests involving small nuclear explosions elsewhere could be more difficult—even impossible—to identify, especially if they were conducted with deliberate subterfuge.

As my hon. Friend said, the full range of issues involved in seismic monitoring was thoroughly aired in the paper the United Kingdom tabled at the conference on disarmament at Geneva last July. It followed two earlier papers to which my hon. Friend also referred.

We do not believe that these papers have received the attention they deserve. One way for them to receive this attention would be for more work to be done in the ad hoc group of scientific experts in the conference on disarmament, to which the United Kingdom would be prepared to contribute. In parallel we will continue to seek an appropriate mandate for an ad hoc committee to discuss these and related matters.

Another idea for verifying a comprehensive test ban Treaty is third country monitoring or an international seismic monitoring network. In this context my hon. Friend has referred to the "six nation" offer of October 1985 to set up monitoring stations on their territory as part of an international network to monitor a nuclear test ban. This offer was directed to President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev in the run-up to their summit meeting in Geneva. The latest six-nation appeal, at the end of February, was similarly directed at the leaders of the two super powers.

There are difficulties with these ideas. First, the seismic stations would have to overcome all the difficulties I have described. Even if any stations used high-frequency monitoring, we do not yet know enough about the capabilities of this technique to place confidence in it achieving adequate verification. But third country monitoring could have a role to play in any adequate verification regime. We certainly hope that those of the six Nations which are members of the conference on disarmament will pursue their ideas at Geneva. As for satellite monitoring, it may help to complement seismological verification, but no more. It is one thing for a satellite to discover and photograph a hole in the ground but it is another to say what that hole is for or what is in it.

In my hon. Friend's interesting speech he also referred to the NORESS experiment being developed in Norway. On 20 November last year I said in the House that this is an interesting development which merits further study. I assure my hon. Friend that our minds are open to all new developments in this area.

My hon. Friend also referred to the announcement by the Soviet Union that it is prepared to have internal seismographic stations installed on its territory. It is true that Mr. Gorbachev in his January proposals offered some form of on-site inspection, but this was in vague terms and only, in his words, "where necessary." Let the Russians explain in detail what they mean. The Americans, on the other hand, deal in specific proposals. For example, in July last year President Reagan offered technical exchanges on verification problems, including the idea of a visit by Soviet experts to witness a US test with any equipment that they wanted to bring.

The Russians have so far failed to address this offer with any seriousness, but it would be a useful step forward in discussing verification in the context of the threshold test ban treaty to which my hon. Friend referred, or the peaceful nuclear explosions treaty, signed but not ratified in the 1970s. Progress towards ratifying those treaties would help to build confidence before tackling the much more difficult issue of a CTBT. Despite the lack of a positive Soviet response to the July offer, President Reagan has just repeated his invitation for a visit to Nevada at a specific time in April. This would allow the Russians to examine a specific and highly promising technology called CORRTEX, which might well provide an adequate basis for verifying yields of explosions and thus help resolve verification issues in the context of the TTB and PNE treaties. We would welcome progress towards ratification. The Soviet response so far has unfortunately once again reportedly been negative, but I very much hope that this will not be their last word.

In contrast with those practical proposals, which President Reagan has been making since 1983, the Russians have been promoting an unverifiable moratorium on testing. This is accompanied by claims that existing means of verification are adequate, or that if only others would join the moratorium verification would not be a problem. I ask my hon. Friend to contrast the realistic, practical approach of seeking to make progress in areas where it should be possible with the approach of proceeding from the outset on the assumption that the desired objective is already a fait accompli.

Has Mr. Gorbachev's position moved beyond the Soviet position of the early 1960s that verification should be concerned only with the reduction phase of an agreement and not with verifying the residual armaments remaining in place? The answer to that important question must be found at the various negotiations which are now in progress. We were frankly disappointed by the first such evidence of how we are to interpret Mr. Gorbachev's positive words when translated into deeds. He stated in January that in the Vienna talks on mutual and balanced force reductions he was willing to accept reasonable verification measures. We therefore looked for a constructive response to the Western proposal of December 1985.

This proposal removed the apparent obstacle of prior data agreement which the East had claimed to be a stumbling block to progress. The West at the same time accepted the Eastern concept of a time-limited agreement involving the United States and Soviet reductions put forward in the Eastern proposal of February 1985. Thus, the Western proposal represented a significant concession and provided a sound basis for progress after so many years of deadlock. Yet the Warsaw Pact's response last month was, alas, merely a rehash of the proposals that the Eastern side tabled in 1983. They were inadequate then and they are inadequate now, because on both information exchange and verification they fail to provide the necessary basis for ensuring the accurate monitoring of compliance.

Verification is also a key issue in the search for a comprehensive and lasting ban on chemical weapons at the conference on disarmament in Geneva. The proposed verification regime for the convention in question is the most extensive yet envisaged for an arms control agreement. Given the widespread industrial application of many chemicals which can be used to produce such weapons, the verification procedures must on the one hand ensure compliance with the convention yet, on the other, they must not compromise commerical confidentiality, or interfere with the day-to-day operation of countries' chemical industries. The United Kingdom, I am glad to say, has taken a leading role at the conference in recent years in proposing verification methods with this aim.

A system of international inspection will, it is generally accepted, be required to monitor the destruction of chemical weapon stockpiles. Routine international inspections will also be necessary, we believe, to check that such weapons are not subsequently produced. In addition, we maintain that an extra element of inspection on challenge is essential in order to deter cheating. The United Kingdom is this year chairing these negotiations for a chemical weapons convention in Geneva and we are pressing very hard for progress.

I agree with my hon. Friend that an agreement with inadequate verification is worse than no agreement at all. The aim of verification must be to generate confidence in arms control agreements.

Once again I should like to thank my hon. Friend for his recognition of the Government's efforts in this most important sphere. Arms control is very much on the East-West agenda this year, more so than for a great many years. In these circumstances of hope it is even more important than ever that we find agreement on realisable measures of verification. That will move the arms control process forward.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference

1. Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the dates and agenda for the next Intergovernmental Conference under the Anglo-Irish agreement.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): Dates of meetings of the Intergovernmental Conference are not released in advance. But while it is not our normal practice to release the agenda in advance, the joint statement issued after the last meeting on 11 March indicated that at its next meeting the conference would consider cross-border security co-operation, the development of relations between the security forces and the community, legal matters, measures to enhance public confidence in the administration of justice, and cross-border economic and social co-operation.

Mr. Archer: Has it struck the right hon. Gentleman that while the political orators have been debating the merits of the emperor's new clothes, many people in Northern Ireland have been waiting to see whether he will be any warmer? After four months, can the Secretary of State point to anything that has changed in daily life in Northern Ireland because it was discussed in the Intergovernmental Conference? If not, when and where can we begin gathering in the harvest?

Mr. King: The most important prize for many will be to get greater confidence in the effectiveness of the security forces and in the fight against terrorism. As I have said to the House, that will be a progressive movement and it will obviously take time for it to develop. However, I am encouraged by the start of the co-operation, particularly in much of the work now taking place between the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Garda under the leadership of the Commissioner and the Chief Constable. I think that the first fruits were shown in the by-elections in the switch of votes from those who support violence to those who support the constitutional Nationalist approach, which was a further encouraging development.

Mr. Gow: Will my right hon. Friend consider removing the secretariat for the Intergovernmental Conference from the Province? Will he also consider the advantages that would flow if future meetings of the Intergovernmental Conference at ministerial level were to take place not in the Province but in London?

Mr. King: The word secretariat has led many people to believe that it is a much more substantial body than is the case. In fact, the secretariat is made up of the secretaries of the conference. The agreement makes it clear that its duty is to service the conference. Obviously it is sensible for that to be organised in a co-operative way. I have picked my hon. Friend up on the point that he made, but my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has just written to the leaders of the two Unionist parties. The letter makes it absolutely clear that we are committed to the agreement and will not suspend it. There is an important statement that we are prepared to operate the agreement in a sensitive way and encourage Unionists to enter into discussions on a wide range of matters. I very much hope that that invitation will be accepted and that we can sit down to sensible discussions about the whole range of issues which are of concern to the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. McNamara: Does the right hon. Gentleman think that it helps confidence in the accord, particularly among the Nationalist community, if members of his ministerial team seek out members of the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill and advise them not to hear oral evidence from the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) on the role of the Ulster Defence Regiment?

Mr. King: I am not aware of that matter. Obviously it is a matter for the Select Committee and its dealings.

Mr. Stanbrook: Does my right hon. Friend think that the cause of the Anglo-Irish agreement has been advanced or retarded, by the refusal of the Dublin court to grant Britain's recent application for the extradition of Evelyn Glenholmes?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend will know that part of the very clear objective of the Anglo-Irish agreement is to improve the efficiency of the extradition procedures. I should have thought that all the evidence of those events, upon which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has commented, makes it ever more clear that those arrangements need to be improved.

Mr. Mallon: Will the Secretary of State confirm that a sizeable section of the population in Northern Ireland are in favour of the accord and want to see it working? Will he consider directing some of his remarks to that section of the community at the earliest possible opportunity, instead of expressing his own inherent Unionism at every opportunity?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman will have heard my words. I have made it absolutely clear that we are committed to and will not suspend the agreement. I am well aware of that fact. I recognise that one of the consequences of the agreement was a recognition among the Nationalist community of the opportunity of progress by constitutional means rather than by having to support the men of violence. I thought that I had made my views very clear on that point. At the same time, it is not in the Nationalist interest to have the degree of misunderstanding and discontent that undoubtedly exists among the Unionist community over the Anglo-Irish agreement. I am anxious that those fears and misunderstandings should be relieved and that genuine concerns should be met in discussions with the Unionists on a number of aspects, such as methods of consultation and involvement that are available to them as well.

Flags and Emblems (Display) Act 1954

2. Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations have been made through the Inter-Governmental Conference concerning the repeal of the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act 1954.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): The Irish side put forward views and proposals about the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act 1954 at the meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference on 10 January. The Government responded at the conference meeting on 11 March.

Mr. Bell: The Flags and Emblems (Display) Act 1954 has been irrelevant for a long time. Although a statement was made by the Government during the discussions to which the Minister referred that there is no such thing as joint authority and that decisions will not be taken on a joint authority basis, will he nevertheless assure the House that this legislation will be repealed during the next parliamentary Session?

Mr. Scott: No. We shall have to consult widely within Northern Ireland about any proposals that are made for a draft order which might include proposals relating to the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act 1954. It is worth being very clear about the Act, which I know has a symbolic effect on both sides of the community in Northern Ireland. It does not ban the flying of the tricolour in Northern Ireland, although there is widespread misapprehension that that is the case. However, it gives special protection to the Union flag in Northern Ireland, which evidently is not considered to be necessary in Great Britain. There is some argument at least for saying that we ought to move towards greater parity of treatment in this matter between Northern Ireland and Great Britain.

Mr. Cash: On the question of the scrutiny of legislation and the procedures that are available in the context of Northern Ireland, will my hon. Friend consider the proposal that has been made for a Select Committee and whether that might provide a forum within which matters such as legislation could be dealt with, having regard to the need to have a round table discussion between hon. Members within the context of the Union as a whole?

Mr. Scott: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said in her letter to the Unionist leaders that she is anxious to talk to them and to discuss what kind of mechanisms might be appropriate for discussions on a wide range of matters in Northern Ireland, not only those that are concerned with the Anglo-Irish agreement. Ministers in Northern Ireland regret very much that the arrangements for consultation between them and the Assembly are not working at the moment because of the refusal of the Assembly to carry out its statutory duties.

Mr. Peter Barry (Talks)

3. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans to visit the Republic of Ireland to hold further discussions with the Irish Foreign Minister.

Mr. Tom King: I have at present no plans to visit the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Flannery: May we assume that when the Minister does speak to his equivalent or to representatives of the Republic of Ireland he will give them assurances that the horrific details of the so-called day of action on 3 March, which are now steadily filtering through to those of us who are keenly interested, will in no way deter the Government from treading the path that they have now decided to tread and that they will not be put off by events of that nature, no matter how many times they are repeated?

Mr. King: There is not much doubt that many of the events of 3 March horrified the overwhelming majority of people in the Province, whatever their persuasion or loyalty. I believe that it is the fervent wish of the vast majority never to see such scenes repeated. I give the assurance that I have given before from the Dispatch Box, that Parliament will not be intimidated by such violence. If it were, the prospects for all in the Province would be much more unhappy.

Sir Philip Goodhart: When my right hon. Friend next communicates with the Minister for Foreign Affairs in the Republic of Ireland, will he inquire why no attempt was made to arrest Miss Glenholmes on a charge of being a suspected member of the IRA , which is an offence in the Republic? Will he tell the Minister that Dublin's reaction to the Glenholmes affair has reminded some people in this country that too many people in Dublin still have an equivocal attitude to terrorism?

Mr. King: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made a statement on this matter. There is to be a disciplinary inquiry by the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions. We are concerned to ensure that extradition works effectively and wish to achieve maximum co-operation with all countries, expecially the Republic of Ireland, to ensure that terrorists are brought to book.

Mr. Hayes: When my right hon. Friend next sees Mr. Barry, will he make it clear to him that the Glenholmes fiasco has nothing to do with the Anglo-Irish agreement? Will he make it clear also that many Conservative Members commend, rather than castigate, the Garda for its action? The Garda's political bosses took many political risks on their side of the water.

Mr. King: I note my hon. Friend's comments. I recognise the efforts by the Garda in this respect. I am confident of the good will of the Government of the Republic in seeking to improve the arrangements where genuinely there are terrorists who may be under their jurisdiction to ensure that the procedures that exist between the two countries operate fairly and effectively.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

4. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a further statement on the Anglo-Irish agreement.

5. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the issues discussed at the Anglo-Irish Conference meeting on Tuesday 11 March.

Mr. Tom King: A further meeting of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference took place in Belfast on 11 March. It was useful and constructive. The issues discussed are set out in the joint statement, issued after the meeting, which I have placed in the Library. In addition to the joint statement, I gave a press conference afterwards to answer questions on the matters discussed.

Mr. Dubs: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the Anglo-Irish agreement could be significantly enhanced if there were closer relationships between this House and the Dail in Dublin? Will he therefore use his influence, nothwithstanding the fact that it is more a matter for the House than for the Government, to ensure that an Anglo-Irish parliamentary tier is established as quickly as possible? Misunderstandings between London and Dublin would thereby be reduced and the basis for the Anglo-Irish agreement would have much more support.

Mr. King: As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, it is a matter for the House and, obviously, not one that falls to me. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has explained the Government's view to the House.

Mr. Alton: Given the concern registered by Dr. Garret FitzGerald during his recent visit to the United Kingdom about the continued discharges of radioactive waste from Sellafield, was that issue discussed at the last meeting of the intergovernmental body? If not, will it be on the agenda of the next meeting? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the report of the Select Committee on the Environment on the discharge of radioactive waste should be considered, and that the continuation of discharges, which is making the Irish sea the most radioactive body of water in the world, is undermining good Anglo-Irish relations?

Mr. King: I do not think that that sort of emotive comment is particularly helpful or objective in any scientific terms. On the issue of Sellafield, there is a Republic interest, as it were, in the island of Ireland in relation to the mainland. Radioactive waste was not discussed at the meeting. It is principally a matter for consideration between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of the Republic. It is not specifically a Northern Ireland matter.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: While it may be encouraging to my right hon. Friend that there have been useful discussions with the Irish Government, is it not a tragedy, and perhaps somewhat understandable, that we still have no active participation in this House by the Official Unionist and the Democratic Unionist parties? Can something be done to encourage those parties back to the House, as their absence from the Chamber—the reasons for which I understand—is difficult to defend to the rest of the country as we are, after all, one united country?

Mr. King: I certainly share to the full the concern expressed by my hon. Friend about the absence of the Unionist Members from the Parliament of the United Kingdom, for which they recently stood for re-election, but in which, in the majority, they have declined to take part. I should like to repeat a sentiment which echoes the strong feelings of a substantial number of Unionists in the Province about the letter from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and to the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley), in which she invited them to enter into talks without preconditions to discuss their concerns to seek ways to make progress. All sensible people of goodwill will recognise that either there will be talks or there will be more serious consequences if the situation is allowed to drift and if the present impasse is allowed to continue.

I hope that I can say from the Dispatch Box, on behalf of the Government and, I hope, with the support of all hon. Members, that there must be talks. I hope that the Unionist Members will accept the invitation from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and enter into talks as soon as possible.

Mr. Favell: Will there be any discussions in those talks on the integration of schoolchildren of different religious persuasions? After all, the problems in the southern States of America—the Klu Klux Klan and the extreme Right — were only resolved finally by the bussing of schoolchildren.

Mr. King: As my hon. Friend knows, there has been some progress in that connection. However, the principle of parental choice is one which the Government have respected. This is a very difficult issue which has not arisen so far in the Conference, although I completely understand why my hon. Friend sees the matter as one of the most important developments that could take place.

Mr. Frank Cook: Does the Secretary of State mean by his last reply that he seeks the demolition of the dual system of education?

Mr. King: I do not know how on earth the hon. Gentleman could have drawn that conclusion from my remarks.

Mr. Gow: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in her letter of 21 March to the Leader of the Ulster Unionist party my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said that she was prepared to consider operating the Anglo-Irish agreement in what she described as "a sensitive way"? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that there is nothing in the agreement which states that the secretariat — the agreement's word, not mine—has to be in the Province, nothing which states that the meetings of the Intergovernmental Conference at ministerial level must be held in the Province, and nothing which requires Ministers to meet every month?

Mr. King: The agreement, as my hon. Friend recognises, refers to regular and frequent meetings. The communiqué states that meetings will normally be held in Belfast, but what my hon. Friend has said is otherwise technically correct. What we need to do, and this is all part of the discussions that need to be held, is to explore the ways in which the Unionists can become involved and meet some of their concerns and anxieties about the present situation.

Mr. Bell: May I say from the Opposition Benches that we deeply regret the fact that elected representatives of Northern Ireland are not here in their rightful place to discuss the affairs of Northern Ireland today? May we also associate ourselves with the remarks of the Secretary of State in connection with the invitation given by the Prime Minister to the Unionist parties? It is right and proper that they should take up that invitation for further talks. There is nothing in the Anglo-Irish agreement or in the Conference that prevents Unionist leaders from talking to the elected Government of the United Kingdom.

Mr. King: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's comments. The Government made it clear through the Prime Minister's letter that we recognise the Unionists' opposition to the Anglo-Irish agreement and that any subsequent talks would be without prejudice to that position. We are prepared to talk on any or all of the matters that were mentioned when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I previously met the two leaders of the Unionist party, including matters on which the agreement has no bearing. We have made what we hope is as helpful a response as possible to the Unionist leaders, recognising the realities of their position and the realities of the agreement.

It would be absolutely tragic if, in the face of that offer, the Unionist leaders were not even prepared to come and talk without pre-conditions or prejudice to their position. That is a step which must be taken, and I hope that they will respond in that way.

Education Budget

8. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the proposed budget for the Northern Ireland Department of Education for 1986-87; and how this compares with the budget for 1985-86.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Dr. Brian Mawhinney): The proposed budget is £662 million—an increase of £42 million.

Mr. Favell: Given the pressure on education and library board budgets for next year, is my hon. Friend satisfied that sufficient progress is being made in the rationalisation of school places?

Dr. Mawhinney: My hon. Friend is on to a good point. There is over-provision of school places, especially in Belfast, and we need to continue an orderly rationalisation process. One of the reasons why we are not getting full benefit from our best-ever teacher-pupil ratios is that teachers are spread too thinly over too many schools.

Mr. Archer: Does the Minister appreciate that while he boasts of the increased resources available to education, talk in the local communities is about how many school cleaners will lose their jobs, how many dinner ladies can expect redundancy notices, how many nursery places will be left after the cuts, whether the Belfast school of music can continue the activities expected in a major city, and whether school buildings will receive any attention other than the most basic repairs? Has he ever felt sufficiently curious to consider why there is such a discrepancy in the picture given by his accountants and what is actually happening in the schools?

Dr. Mawhinney: First, I am not boasting, I am simply relating the facts of the case. Secondly, I am aware of the matters that the right hon. and learned Member has mentioned, some of which were raised when I met representatives of some of the boards during the process that they have to undertake to determine their budget allocation proposals, which they then submit to me. So far, although I believe that some of the budget proposals have reached the Department, I have not seen any of them.

Mr. Lilley: Will my hon. Friend comment on the fact that in the school system in Northern Ireland, which has retained a large measure of selection, performance as measured by examination results and otherwise is now far superior to that of schools on the mainland? Will he draw from that fact conclusions from which schools on the mainland might benefit and reflect on the advantages to employers who may wish to employ people in Northern Ireland?

Dr. Mawhinney: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the better A-level results that are emerging from the Province compared with schools in England, but he will bear in mind that across the breadth of the educational spectrum results in Northern Ireland vary.

United States Financial Aid

9. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects Northern Ireland to be in receipt of the first tranche of promised American financial aid; and what are his priorities for its use.

Mr. Scott: Legislation providing for United States assistance to both parts of Ireland is before Congress. I am not in a position to speculate when a Bill will become law or to what use any assistance might be put.

Mr. Wallace: With unemployment in Northern Ireland running at more than 20 per cent., does the Minister agree that the first priority for any additional funds must be the creation of jobs, not through De Lorean-type fiascos, but through investment in small businesses and infrastructure projects? Will he give the House some idea of the total amount expected to be gathered from American aid?

Mr. Scott: I think that it would be premature to speculate about the amount. A number of proposals have been put either to the House of Representatives or to the Senate. Until we see the size of the amounts involved, it is probably wrong to start making plans to spend the money, but I have considerable sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that one of the top priorities for any money that may come through should be the creation of jobs.

Mr. Budgen: Is my hon. Friend aware that many people regard such aid not as generous but as patronising, ignorant and biased? Has he any proposals to offer advice or aid to the Americans in terms of how they might deal with the appalling problems of their inner cities?

Mr. Scott: The short answer to that is no, Sir, but I am sure that if the Americans came to us for advice we would freely give it. Let me make it clear that we entered into the agreement on its merits. There was no question of the United States, or the promise of United States aid, playing any part in the decision of the Government of the United Kingdom to enter into the agreement. Nevertheless, we are grateful to the United States for wishing to acknowledge, and to make a tangible display of acknowledging, the desire of the Governments of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland to work towards peace and stability in Northern Ireland. The final decisions will, of course, have to await the passage of legislation through Congress.

Mr. Mallon: May I ask the Minister to consider patronising the constituency of Newry and Armagh when the aid becomes available? We would have no objection to that at all.

Does not inward investment into Northern Ireland become very difficult when a Government Department responsible for Government training schemes is presiding over a system in which, out of 116 senior posts, 16 are held by Catholics? Will the Minister ask the Fair Employment Agency to initiate an immediate investigation of that matter so that people who want to invest money in the north of Ireland will not have to look at that sort of thing?

Mr. Scott: My hon. Friends will have heard about the matter raised in the second part of the question and will no doubt consider the situation. I note the hon.

Gentleman's first question, but until we know whether there is to be a fund and how big it will be it is impossible to speculate about the uses to which it might be put.

Mr. Chapman: If, and when, the money comes, will my hon. Friend seriously consider using at least a part of it to mount a publicity campaign to attract industry and jobs to the Province under the slogan, "Come, make your place of work in Northern Ireland. There is far less lawlessness here than there is in the United States"?

Mr. Scott: The Industrial Development Board, in particular, has for some time been conducting a sustained publicity campaign in Great Britain and the United States, clearly pointing out the attractions of Northern Ireland for potential inward investment and paying special attention to the overwhelming normality that is the reality of life for most people in the Province.

Security

10. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the current security situation in the Province.

Mr. Tom King: Since I last answered questions in the House on 27 February, two members of the security forces and one civilian have died in incidents arising from the security situation in the Province. I am sure the whole House will join me in condemning these murders. In addition, more than 100 members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Army have been injured, many of the former duing the shameful events of 3 March.

Since the beginning of the year a total of 55 people have been charged with serious offences, 52 weapons, 2,700 rounds of ammunition and 1,100 lb of explosives have been recovered.

Mr. Maclennan: That is a sombre report. Has the Secretary of State spoken to the GOC about the use of mortar bombs in the attempted attack on the UDR base at Kilkeel on 15 March, and can he make a statement about that?

Mr. King: I have spoken to the GOC about that matter. The mortar attacks have posed a serious threat. The security forces have been anxious to take the most positive steps to ensure proper protection, especially of police stations, which have been subject to attack, and to try to counter that most unattractive technique.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: While I regret the large number of members of the RUC who have been killed over the 50-odd years of problems in Northern Ireland, may I ask my right hon. Friend to accept that the members of the RUC themselves to not wish to be armed, that they feel that because they are armed they are natural targets, and that, further, they feel that they are not totally protected by the rest of the security forces?

Mr. King: That would be the long-term aim, but I, do not think that it is a practical possibility at present.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Will the right hon. Gentleman try to come to an understanding that, whatever happens over Easter and in the weeks beyond, the ultimate responsibility will lie, as ever, with the ambiguities and insincerities of the policy of successive British Governments towards Northern Ireland and its people?

Mr. King: We all have a responsibility at present, not to anticipate trouble, but to seek in every way we can to discourage any such trouble from taking place. I hope that I can look to the right hon. Gentleman, in his position as a Member of this House, to join with all hon. Members in saying that the right way to resolve the difficulties, ambiguities or uncertainties is by discussion and consultation, and that at no time can there be a case for violence and confrontation.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is not the security position in Northern Ireland aggravated by payments to the IRA under kidnap insurance arrangements? Why is it that the Government repeatedly ask me to produce evidence when they know that those policies are being sold, when that is common knowledge in the City, and when it amounts to £400 million worth of business every year? Why do the Government not investigate those matters, which they know are illegal under section 10 of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1976? Why do they insist on turning a blind eye? Is it that they do not want to do anything about the matter?

Mr. King: Nobody could accuse the Government of not wishing to take every possible step to fight terrorism. As the hon. Gentleman has been told, we are seeking to take every step that we can, but if he has evidence that is not available to us, he should produce it.

Mr. Mallon: Will the Secretary of State confirm that probably one of the most serious security issues at present and for the next few months will be the marches that will take place? Will he confirm that the march which is organised by so-called Loyalists in Portadown for next Monday is nothing more than a coat-trailing exercise in triumphalism, geared to exacerbate sectarian feelings and to promote the type of sectarian strife that we saw last July?

Mr. King: I recognise the tradition of marching that exists in Northern Ireland and the more recent attempts to turn them into deliberately provocative incidents. I hope that all who care about law and order in the Province will recognise the present peculiarly sensitive atmosphere and the risks of such provocation and that all responsible people in the Province will recognise the need to avoid such provocation. I am confident that the RUC will be anxious in its responsibilities, which are clear, and the Chief Constable in his operational responsibility to protect innocent people from such provocation.

Commonwealth Games

12. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his policy towards Belfast seeking to stage the 1994 Commonwealth Games.

Dr. Mawhinney: I welcome the initiative shown by the Northern Ireland Commonwealth Games Council and the Northern Ireland Assembly in indicating support for staging the games in Northern Ireland, and I have recently established a working party to consider the feasibility of doing so.

Mr. Bellingham: Is my hon. Friend aware that one of the strengths of the Irish is that sport transcends politics and religion? Surely the examples of Barry McGuigan and all-Ireland rugger demonstrate that dramatically? One can add to that the sporting exploits of the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) when he was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. In the light of that, surely no effort should be spared in attempts to get the games to Belfast?

Dr. Mawhinney: I am pleased that my hon. Friend shares my enthusiasm at the prospect of the games being staged in Northern Ireland, but he will understand that it is necessary to explore seriously all the various aspects of the staging of the games before a decision is made. That is exactly what I have asked the working party to do, and I hope to receive its report in February 1987.

Mr. Forth: Can my hon. Friend give an undertaking that every effort will be made to seek methods of funding such an activity through the private sector, in order to protect the public purse against the type of damage that can be inflicted on it by unsuccessful events of this type, should they occur?

Dr. Mawhinney: I can assure my hon. Friend that the working party is mindful of the point that he raises, and that it will be part of its deliberations before it writes its report.

Harland and Wolff

13. Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many working days have been lost through industrial action in Harland and Wolff in each of the years 1982 to 1985.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): Harland and Wolff has an excellent industrial relations record. In the years in question Harland and Wolff was never closed by strike action. I shall arrange for the detailed figures of man days lost in these years—very low figures indeed—to be published in the Official Report.

Mr. Cash: Can my hon. Friend assure the House that the tender submitted by Harland and Wolff for the AOR did not contain any element of subsidy?

Dr. Boyson: I can certainly assure the House of that, as I did when some two weeks ago when questioned by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). We put in PA Management Consultants, an independent and interationally respected firm to review fully the terms of Harland and Wolff's bid. It concluded that the tender was comprehensively costed, contains a profit margin, and did not benefit in any way from cost subsidy.

Mr. Stephen Ross: Anyone who knows John Parker and who has visited Harland and Wolff will know that it is a most up-to-date shipyard and has excellent management. I hope that Ministers are supporting its application for both or at least on of these orders, and I hope, too, that Harland and Wolff will be successful.

Dr. Boyson: I am grateful to the hon. Member for his comment. Obviously Northern Ireland Ministers are supporting Harland and Wolff. Between the first and the fourth of the Blue Star refrigeration cargo ships that were handed over, there was a 22 per cent. increase in productivity. Apart from one ship, which suffered fire damage while it was being built, they were all delivered on time. Northern Ireland Ministers are supporting the bid by Harland and Wolff. It is a competitive bid without any subsidies.

Mr. Fallon: Will my hon. Friend confirm that public spending last year on industry and unemployment in Northern Ireland was some 404 per cent. higher per capita than it was in England? Does he accept that there will be strong resentment in the north-east of England if this order is stolen from Tyneside because of public subsidy in Northern Ireland?

Dr. Boyson: If my hon. Friend had listened to my earlier reply, he would have heard me say that PA Mangagement Consultants has gone into this. There is no cross-subsidisation. It is a genuine tender that was economically worked out. Hon Members in all parts of the House have recognised for a long time that Northern Ireland has a problem of extremely high unemployment. As money is switched from the Treasury to areas in the north-east and to other areas because of depression and high unemployment, Northern Ireland, as one of those areas of high unemployment and economic difficulty, has also received money.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Is the Minister aware of the consequences to Swan Hunter of not getting this order? It will result in 2,000 redundancies on Tyneside. He has given the House assurances about costings and cross-subsidies, but if what he says turns out not to be true and Harland and Wolff obtains the order, who will pick up the price tag? Will it not be the British taxpayer?

Dr. Boyson: All hon. Members are aware that if one shipyard gets a contract another one does not. I have sympathy for the people who are made redundant in any shipyard. This competition is between a shipyard in the north-east, in the hon. Member's constituency, and Harland and Wolff in Northern Ireland. In the opinion of Northern Ireland Ministers and, I am sure, in the opinion of all Government Ministers, the judgment should be made on the basis of which of the tenders is the fairer, which offers the better delivery date, the yard from which the better ship is likely to come and the one which provides the lower cost to the Exchequer.

I shall not try to evade any of the points made by the hon. Member. I say to him that it will not be the British taxpayer who subsidises this order. This is a defence contract and, for that reason, must have a built-in profit margin. One of the problems for Harland and Wolff is that, in comparison with other shipyards, it has been dependent upon ordinary cargo shipping, and until recently has not had any defence contracts. I am sure that all hon. Members are aware that there is probably not a shipyard in the world able to build civil shipping at a profit. All our shipyards depend for profit on defence contracts.

Following are the figures:

One-day Strike

14. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the estimated cost to (a) the public purse and (b) private individuals of the damage caused during the course of the one-day strike on Monday 3 March.

Mr. Scott: Full information is not yet available. However, up to 14 March, 491 notices of intention to claim compensation for damage to property had been served on my right hon. Friend. The cost of police overtime is estimated at £470,000. There is no doubt that the events of 3 March caused grave damage to Northern Ireland, both financially and in terms of its reputation.

Mr. Ross: I hope that wide publicity will be given to the Minister's answer and that we shall get more detailed information when the size of the claims that have been submitted are known. May I express the hope that the politicians in Northern Ireland who helped to organise the day of strike will take note of the figures and understand that the rest of the country feels great anger about the figures that are likely to be involved?

Mr. Scott: I would wish to echo that sentiment. Many disgraceful things happened on 3 March and grave damage was done to the reputation of Northern Ireland in the wider world. I hope that there will be no repetition of it.

Dr. Godman: As it has been alleged that certain UDR personnel were involved in the disturbances, may I remind the Secretary of State that he said earlier today that he was quite unaware of the charge that one of his junior Ministers had sought to dissuade Conservative Members of the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill from taking oral evidence from the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon)? Will the Secretary of State investigate this most serious charge and report to the House?

Mr. Scott: I find myself in exactly the same position as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I have no knowledge of the charge to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. The allegations that members of the UDR were involved in what took place on 3 March are being investigated by the appropriate authorities.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 27 March.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having meetings with ministerial colleagues and others later today.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Prime Minister take time out of her busy day today to study the positions that are being taken by various countries contributing to the multi-fibre arrangement talks that will take place next week in Geneva? Is she aware of the potential damage that could be done to the domestic market, in which substantial firms in my constituency, such as Pringle of Hawick and Barrie Knitwear, operate, if the volume of imports outwith the EEC is much increased beyond existing levels? Will the right hon. Lady give us an assurance that she will use her authority to try to sustain the limits that are set out in the current EEC mandate, so that they cannot be breached in the bilateral discussions that will flow from next week's talks? Will she seek to use her influence with her American friends to try to make them less isolationist, so that they get together with the EEC negotiators to establish a fair framework of international textile trading?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is talking about an extremely important series of negotiations that are to start in Geneva next week. The Ministers for Foreign Affairs set the mandate in great detail — the hon. Gentleman will know that these documents are decided in great detail. Therefore, the negotiations must take place within that detailed mandate. The negotiators would have to go back for another one if it were to be altered.

I do not think that there is any point in trying to put pressure on the United States at the moment. It is possible that it will make its position clear once the negotiations have started. We shall, of course, take an interest in its position, which will be extremely important for many of our constituencies.

Mr. Sims: Has my right hon. Friend noted that in the course of the Easter recess the Greater London council will cease to exist, with the result that many London ratepayers will be receiving rate demands that will be substantially lower than those of previous years? Would she care to draw the attention of Londoners to the close association between these two events?

The Prime Minister: Being a London Member, I am very much aware of what my hon. Friend has said. The GLC will go out of existence. It has long outlived its usefulness because so many of its duties have been transferred to other bodies or other councils. I agree with my hon. Friend that the ratepayers of London are already breathing a sigh of relief at the extinction of the GLC.

Mr. Kinnock: As the right hon. Lady is a London Member, does she think that, on the day on which an authoritative report is published showing that 600,000 people in the London boroughs are either homeless or without a secure home, it is just or sensible that her Government have intervened to prevent the expenditure of necessary moneys on the improvement of properties throughout those London boroughs?

The Prime Minister: The Government have an excellent record in the private and public sector. The number of renovations has exceeded those under the previous Government, and there are already more houses. I suggest that the right hon. Gentleman also looks at the number of council properties that are vacant, some of which have been vacant for over a year.

Mr. Kinnock: The Government have the worst ever record on housing. They have made a 59 per cent. cut in public spending on housebuilding and house improvement in the public sector since they first came into office, and they have betrayed the needs of old and young people who require accommodation. Instead of resorting to the kinds of words that she does, why does the right hon. Lady not take note of the reports of the Duke of Edinburgh, the Department of the Environment and the Church of England, which say that priority should be given to a real housing programme?

The Prime Minister: There are well over 1 million more dwellings than there were during the lifetime of the previous Government, and house improvements in the public and private sector far exceed those under the previous Government.

Sir Hugh Rossi: If, as a result of recent problems regarding extradition, it is decided to make changes within the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions, will my right hon. Friend ensure that recruitment does not take place from among those who advise the Leader of the Opposition on expulsions from the Labour party?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes his point very effectively.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Does the Prime Minister find it acceptable that the armed forces of the United States should violate the mainland territory of an independent country in North Africa, and will she distance the United Kingdom from that action?

The Prime Minister: As I said on Tuesday, I believe that the United States is absolutely within its rights to keep international waters and airspace open. When there is an unwarranted attack on aircraft in international air space from the land of another country, the United States has the right to defend its planes under article 51.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Will my right hon. Friend try to persuade President Reagan to turn his attention away from his Libyan sideshow towards the fundamental problem in the middle east — the future of the Palestinians? Does she agree that the absence of any form of diplomatic peace process in the middle east, when combined with the growing repression on the West Bank and in Gaza, where there have been increased deportations and detentions without trial, can only fuel international terrorism and bring the prospect of armed conflict in the middle east that bit closer?

The Prime Minister: I agree that the fact that there are no negotiations in prospect at the moment over resolving the main Arab-Israeli problem is a cause of great concern. Since the initiative of King Hussein of Jordan broke down there has not been another, other than the agreement at Camp David some time ago, which the United States may think fit to revive. I share my hon. Friend's concern.

Q2. Mr. Maclennan asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 27 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Maclennan: Following the Prime Minister's decision to wipe out those local authorities with whose policies she disagrees, and the failure of the Leader of the Opposition to curb the cancerous spread of fundamentalist extremism within the Labour party, will she seek to protect local democracy in Britain by trusting the people and introducing a fair and proportional voting system?

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. I note what the hon. Gentleman says about, in effect, the GLC, and I note that his constituency is about as far from London as it could possibly be.

Mr. McQuarrie: In the course of my right hon. Friend's busy day, will she take time to read the national press about the shambles in the Labour party——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That might just about have to do with Prime Ministerial responsibility.

Mr. McQuarrie: Will my right hon. Friend find time to read the national press, where she will find some very interesting information about the Labour party, which illustrates clearly the danger that this country would face if we had a Labour Government—an unlikely event—with a Labour Prime Minister who was not in control of his own party?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend's analysis, but I am sure he will understand when I say that I have more important things to do than to read those reports.

Mr. Foot: Should not the Prime Minister and the country as a whole be deeply concerned about the frustration and abandonment of the international treaties stopping the testing of nuclear weapons? What action do the Government intend to take immediately to try to restore the effectiveness of those treaties, bearing in mind that we are treaty bound to try to ensure that such a system is re-established, or is this just another matter on which she prefers to take instructions from the President of the United States?

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. But the right hon. Gentleman is correct to say that the comprehensive test ban treaty negotiations are not proceeding at any pace at all. They have come up against difficulties in verification. There have recently been proposals about offers to discuss verification, with a view to American ratification of the peaceful nuclear explosive treaty and the threshold test ban treaty. But those included particular aspects of verification depending upon some of the latest discoveries and upon new technical forms of verification which have recently been made possible.

Totnes

Q3. Mr. Steen asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Totnes.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Mr. Steen: When the Prime Minister does visit Totnes, will she ensure that she visits the Waterside development, where she will see that derelict warehouses have been renovated to a high standard thanks to a local entrepreneur with a great sense of civic pride and thanks to local people with a sense of community and conservation? If that sense of civic pride were transferred to inner city neighbourhoods, might it not go a long way towards restoring morale and be far more effective than pumping yet more public money into the inner cities?

The Prime Minister: I know of that scheme and I agree with my hon. Friend's analysis. It is an excellent scheme that has been led by the private sector, helped by a certain amount of public money and pursued with the total dedication of the local community. I agree that such a scheme would go a long way towards helping the problems of inner cities. I am sure that my hon. Friend will have read with the greatest interest the Chief Rabbi's report on inner cities, and will have agreed with most of the things that he said.

Dr. Owen: Now that, after the Budget, the Gallup poll has shown — [HON. MEMBERS: "Totnes."] I am not going to speak in the House, Mr speaker, against a constant barrage—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman has as much right to be heard as have other right hon. and hon. Members.

Hon. Members: Totnes.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman's question is, I hope, related to Totnes.

Dr. Owen: Now that the Gallup poll following the Budget has confirmed that the SDP/Liberal alliance is in the lead—a situation that has already been confirmed by the electors of Totnes, who have chosen the SDP/Liberal alliance to control Devon county council—is it not clear that the people of this country will not be so easily bribed, and are more interested in an economic recovery and in getting people back to work than in seeing 1p being taken off the standard rate of tax?

The Prime Minister: I think I am right in saying that the rates have gone up in that area as a result of alliance control.

Mr. Lilley: Will my right hon. Friend reflect on the opinion poll—doubtless influenced by the electors of Totnes — which shows that 80 per cent. of the population supported the decision to cut the rate of income tax by 1p?

The Prime Minister: I take note of that. This Government's achievements have been made, not by twisting and turning with every opinion poll, but by carrying out with persistence and perseverance the policies upon which we were elected.

Engagements

Q4. Mr. Fisher asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 27 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fisher: What advice can the Prime Minister give to her party's candidate in the Fulham by-election to help him when addressing the 30 per cent. of the electorate who are the private tenants of absentee landlords? Why cannot private tenants have the same right to buy as council tenants?

The Prime Minister: It is not the Government's job to give away private property—[Interruption.] I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman approves of the sale of council houses, but it is not possible, under totally different circumstances, to deprive private citizens of their freedoms.

Business of the House

10.31 am

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for the week after the Easter recess?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): The business for the first week after the Adjournment will be as follows:

TUESDAY 8 APRIL—Remaining stages of the Dockyard Services Bill.

WEDNESDAY 9 APRIL—Progress on remaining stages of the Airports Bill.

THURSDAY 10 APRIL—Until about seven o'clock, completion of remaining stages of the Airports Bill, followed by remaining stages of the Armed Forces Bill.

FRIDAY 11 APRIL—Private Members' Bills.

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. He will recall that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry assured the House on Tuesday that no further decisions affecting BL would be taken during the Easter recess. Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm that before any further moves are made there will be a full debate as speedily as possible after the recess so that hon. Members in all parts of the House can make their opinions known on the issue, which is critical for the regions and for the whole economy?

Last week I asked the right hon. Gentleman for a foreign affairs debate to be held immediately after the recess. That has become more pressing because of the clash between units of the American sixth fleet and Libya and the decision by President Reagan to send $20 million worth of support as a back-door way of financing the terrorist contest on the border between Honduras and Nicaragua. Can the right hon. Gentleman assure me that a foreign affairs debate will be held shortly after the recess so that we can take those and other matters into account?

Will the right hon. Gentleman also arrange, soon after the recess, a debate on the Government's attitude to the introduction of a poll tax, which the Prime Minister favours, especially in view of the evidence from the Institute of Local Government Studies that in an average inner London borough such as Hammersmith and Fulham the average rate bill of £277 per head would rise under a poll tax to £510 per head—an 84 per cent. increase?

Hon. Members: Those figures are wrong.

Mr. Biffen: There is a mild element of disagreement about the right hon. Gentleman's final remark. A Green Paper has been issued on that topic. Through the usual channels we can consider when it would be appropriate to proceed to a debate.

As the right hon. Gentleman knows, I have conveyed my sympathy about having a foreign affairs debate reasonably soon. Perhaps through the usual channels we can consider the timing of it. The right hon. Gentleman is right that the motion for such a debate should be drawn in such terms as to enable the widest possible consideration of the many topics which excite public concern.

I cannot helpfully add to what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has already said about the appropriateness of a debate on BL once discussions are concluded, but I take account of what the right hon. Gentleman says.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Since the Committee stage of the Building Societies Bill finished at the end of February, when may we expect its Report stage? Before then, will my right hon. Friend ask the Economic Secretary to continue the excellent procedure which he adopted in Committee of producing detailed amendments and proposals as early as possible so that they can be discussed?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly pass my hon. Friend's comments to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary. They will be much appreciated. My hon. Friend will have noticed that the business for the first week back signals our desire that a number of Bills be passed to the other place. My hon. Friend should view the prospects of the Building Societies Bill in that way.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Is the Leader of the House aware that the independent review body has determined in favour of the National Coal Board's plans for the Hawthorn complex in the north-east? The community will be greatly affected by the decision with the loss of 300 jobs, and the unemployment level will be at about 33 per cent.

Is the Leader of the House aware that the decisions on the Bates colliery and the Horden colliery and the recent decision on the Eppleton colliery mean that people see the independent review body as a charade. The last drop of credibility has finally gone down the drain. However, there is one opportunity left for recovery. The National Coal Board has yet to make its final decision. Will the right hon. Gentleman give me a guarantee that the Government will lean on the NCB to save vital jobs in my constituency?

Mr. Biffen: I am not sure that I am the most natural leaner in the Government. However, I will pass the hon. Gentleman's anxieties to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Has my right hon. Friend had time to consider the findings of the report of the Select Committee on the Environment in which considerable doubts were cast on the suitability of present methods of disposing of intermediate and low-level nuclear waste? In view of the considerable research that went into that report, will my right hon. Friend agree to defer the laying of the special development order, especially as it concerns Fulbeck which is near my constituency, until the full recommendations of the report have been investigated and debated in the House?

Mr. Biffen: I refer my hon. Friend to the remarks I made in the recess Adjournment motion debate. What was said then was said with measured tones, and I have nothing to add to it.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The one notable omission from the business of the House on our return is the Second Reading of the Shops Bill.

On Tuesday the Leader of the House said that he considered that people earn their rest over Easter—he was referring to hon. Members. Can the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that the Government will reconsider their present position on de-restricted Sunday trading? Will he ensure that when we come back he will say that, having thought about it, he and the Patronage Secretary will allow their colleagues to vote on the matter as a matter of conscience and not insist, as he has so far, that there is a Government three-line or two-line Whip on the legisation?

Mr. Biffen: I am happy to say that conscience is entirely the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary. That puts him in a uniquely capable position for holding that responsibility. As to any future announcement on the Second Reading of the Shops Bill, it will proceed in the natural manner.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend note that I speak as a non-smoker, but I call for an open debate on taxation policy relating to smoking. People have a right to choose to smoke, although they know of the hazards to their health in so doing. Will he take special note of the pressure of the Liberal and Labour parties to increase taxation on smokers and to deprive people of smoking in all sorts of places where it is not unreasonable to do so? Provision has been made for non-smoking areas. If such provision is made for the comfort of non-smokers, is it not appropriate that proper account should be taken of people's right to smoke if they wish to do so?

Mr. Biffen: I am certain my hon. Friend is right to imply that the recent Budget changes have a significant impact on the tobacco industry and those it employs. I suggest that the most appropriate circumstances for such a debate will be on the relevant clause of the Finance Bill, although it is not appropriate for me to tell him which clauses will be taken upstairs and which downstairs. I think that the matters to which he referred make the relevant clause a candidate for consideration downstairs.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Will the Leader of the House tell us why he chose to list the Dockyard Services Bill for its Report stage on the Tuesday we come back, given that the Public Accounts Committee has held an investigation into the royal naval dockyards and the fact that significant documents for our consideration of the Bill will not be available until the Monday following the date listed? The PAC's report will not be available until about 22 April. Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his hurry was, and what he was trying to hide?

Mr. Biffen: It is a question of neither hurry nor hide but of a generous and liberal interpretation of what might be for the best convenience of the House, with the business and the whipping that has developed on the first day back. The hon. Gentleman advises delay and mentions documents dated 22 April, but it is unrealistic to think in terms of holding back the legislation that far, bearing in mind the fact that its passage in another place is still to follow.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Has my right hon. Friend seen on the Order Paper early-day motion 538?

[That this House calls upon the Government to seek to amend the Shops Bill [Lords] so as to preserve the special character of Sunday and to have regard for the principles and conscience of those who would be affected by the total deregulation of Sunday trading.]

The motion has been signed by nearly 70 of my right hon. and hon. Friends, and opposes the Government's intention totally to deregulate Sunday trading. Is he aware that, if the Government thought that they had problems with their Back-Benchers over Westland and Land Rover, he ain't seen nothing yet? Will he consider that the best way in which the Government might honourably get themselves off the hook is by granting their own Members a free vote?

Mr. Biffen: I thought it generous of my hon. Friend, having used such military language, to end with a request that he knows perfectly well I cannot grant but can be granted only by my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): In view of the considerable anxieties that have been expressed in the Chamber in the past week about the placement of the AOR lead vessel contract, will the Leader of the House find time for us to debate that matter before the final decision is made? Will he consider having a debate about the principle of privatised warship yards having to compete with subsidised state-owned industry?

Mr. Biffen: If eloquence could secure the placing of the order for that ship, the contribution by the hon. Gentleman the other evening would have secured it for the north-east——

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Give it to him, then.

Mr. Biffen: Alas, I am a creature of market forces. Of course, the point that the hon. Gentleman made about the parliamentary handling of the business will be borne in mind, but I cannot hold out very much hope.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Would it not be helpfull if, before the Fulham by-election, the House had a full debate on the chronic state of the Labour party?

Mr. Biffen: There are some things that cannot even be improved by debate.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Did the Leader of the House hear the exchanges during Prime Minister's Question Time about the important negotiations on the renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement, and the Prime Minister's confirmation of the importance of those negotiations for the textile and clothing industry? Can the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that a statement will be made in the week when we return updating hon. Members on the current state of the negotiations?

Mr. Biffen: I recognise, as all the House will, the importance of the MFA discussions, and I shall certainly refer to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry the hon. Gentleman's request.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): Has my right hon. Friend noted recent reports that British Airways is to replace air hostesses with northern accents, based in Manchester, with air hostesses from London? When can the House have an opportunity to debate this blatant example of regional discrimination so that we can make it clear that if BA is privatised my constituents from the north will have an equal chance to apply for shares?

Mr. Biffen: I was not aware of that quite breathtaking development. I agree that if we are to have endless debates, which I fear we will, from time to time we need a little break into reality. What my hon. Friend suggests is one of the more cheerful aspects of regional policy.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Has the Leader of the House taken time to look at early-day motions 204 and 217 about speech therapists which are signed by hon. Members on both sides of the House?

[Mr. Doug Hoyle]

[That this House notes with concern that speech therapists, members of a highly-skilled caring profession, discharging a wide range of responsibilities, are underpaid in comparison with other National Health Service professionals doing work of equal value; notes also that speech therapy is traditionally a female profession; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to provide sufficient funds to enable speech therapists' salary levels to be increased so that speech therapists receive equal pay for work of equal value.]

[That this House expresses its appreciation of the valuable work performed by speech therapists; and, in expressing its concern that decreasing comparative salary levels will dissuade the ablest of individuals from entering this profession, calls upon Her Majesty's Government to ensure that speech therapists are remunerated at a level equal to that of other graduate specialists within the National Health Service.]

They draw attention to the very low pay and conditions of those highly qualified people and their effect on recruitment, not only in my constituency but in all constituencies. I know that this matter was drawn to the attention of the Leader of the House by my right hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) during the debate on the Easter recess motion. Will the Leader of the House press the Secretary of State for Social Services to make an early statement to the House after the Easter recess?

Mr. Biffen: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has referred to the contribution made by his right hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin). I shall certainly refer to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services the fact that there is interest in a statement being made.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): As everyone has agreed that the present regulations on Sunday trading are ridiculous, is not the burden of proof on those who are opposed to total deregulation to make suggestions which are sensible, workable and enforceable? Therefore, will my right hon. Friend ensure that there is plenty of time on Second Reading of the Shops Bill to give them an opportunity to put those suggestions to the House? In the absence of such suggestions, is not the only logical and intellectual conclusion that total deregulation is the only way forward?

Mr. Biffen: I could answer that question only by heightening controversy when I am required to pretend that it hardly exists.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is the Leader of the House aware that when the PAC examined in private session the subject of dockyards and the privatisation of dockyards there were clearly matters raised which would be of importance during the debate which is to take place a week on Tuesday? In so far as it is probable that the PAC would wish to publish much of the evidence taken in private session without sidelining, why cannot the debate be delayed to ensure that the maximum possible information is made available to hon. Members?

Mr. Biffen: I think that I dealt with that issue in my response to the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam). I shall bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's comments in the context of the Bill eventually being considered in another place and with the possibilty of its being reconsidered in the House.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): May we have an early debate on industrial relations in the newspaper industry so that the Labour party may end its hypocritical, silence over the way in which Mr. Maxwell appears to run his newspapers?

Mr. Biffen: I am not sure about the silence being hypocritical but it is definitely spasmodic. At the moment, no provision has been made for such a debate, but I agree that it must be a lively candidate.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Will the Leader of the House ask the Secretary of State for Social Services to give some thought during the recess to making the lot of the 2,500 partially sighted children in this country better rather than worse by the proposed changes in the supply of their specialised spectacles and lenses? The proposed changes are causing great distress to their families and teachers. It is a small group of people. The matter should not be left to a voucher system because that will not cover the cost of their necessarily specialised equipment.

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly draw that point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. Peter Lilley (St. Albans): May I support the plea of my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) for an early debate on industrial relations in the newspaper industry? Surely the House should have an opportunity to consider the strange fact that the dispute in Wapping has led to a threat to free speech in the shape of the refusal of the Labour party to have any dealings with Mr. Murdoch, whereas the dispute in Glasgow has led to no such action? Should we not have the opportunity to investigate whether that is because of any financial relationship between Mr. Maxwell and the Labour party?

Mr. Biffen: The attractiveness of the debate increases every moment, and it is already being outlined as going much wider than the newspapers of Mr. Rupert Murdoch. I am sure that if we cannot contrive to find time for such a debate, particularly over the next few days and during the period of the Fulham by-election, the Labour party will take an early opportunity to make an explicit statement about where it stands on the two newspaper actions by the two newspaper tycoons.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): Is the Leader of the House aware that concern about the auxiliary oil replenishment vessel order is felt not only in Tyneside but stretches to Yorkshire, where concern is felt among component suppliers, such as those in my constituency?

May I refer the Leader of the House to the business on the Thursday evening? Why are the Government so sensitive that they feel that they must gag the House, as they used their majority to gag the Select Committee when it looked at the terms and conditions of employment in the armed forces? Why are we to have a debate on Thursday night, less than 24 hours after the publication of the Select Committee's report? Is it not an insult to the House to expect it to be able to read that report and put down appropriate amendments, which by then will all be starred amendments, for the debate on Thursday? It is a deplorable way to treat the House. It is typical of the Government's arrogance and of the way in which they are using their majority.

Mr. Biffen: There is no question of gag or censorship in what is being proposed. What has been proposed is perfectly reasonable and is consistent with precedent. I have no doubt that on the Floor of the House there will be a lively debate between those who wish to defend the bravery and integrity of the Ulster Defence Regiment and those who wish to disparage it.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): As a self-confessed creature of market forces, will my right hon. Friend reaffirm his faith and that of the Government in free trade and the free movement of not only goods and services but capital as the great engine of economic prosperity? If that is the position, does my right hon. Friend feel that it is time that the House debated at a very early stage the reaffirmation of our faith in the free movement of goods, capital and services by extensive United Kingdom investment in the United States? Does he not believe that the House should be given the opportunity to reaffirm that prosperity can come yet again from extensive American investment, when the Americans believe it to be right and justified, in growth points of British industry?

Mr. Biffen: Perhaps I should define my position as a traditional high Tory with a fastidious leaning towards market forces. I am the kind of Tory who will be very much influenced by the persuasive speech that my hon. Friend has just made, but I think that it has to stand alone and unique and must not be cluttered up by more general debate.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Will the Leader of the House bring to the attention of the relevant Ministers the fact that the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan counties will put at risk the funding of dozens of citizens advice bureaux throughout the country, bureaux which last year dealt with 300,000 inquiries about fuel, mainly fuel poverty, that with the privatisation of the gas industry the rights of the consumer councils will be diminished and that between the two the needs and the rights of consumers are being eroded further by the Government?

Mr. Biffen: I take account of what the hon. Lady says, but I do not think that she will be entirely surprised if I have a certain agnosticism about what she implies. However, I shall most certainly refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, because it relates to serious consumer issues.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): When shall we have an additional follow-up debate on local government so that we may look again at rates and propaganda, in particular, in Leicester, where, despite an additional £300,000 having been given to the city of Leicester, it has still levied an 80 per cent. rates rise? To try to get round the propaganda rules, the city of Leicester has set up its own publicity company to ensure that it can still spend more than £300,000 of ratepayers' money each year.

Will my right hon. Friend set a lead for the rest of the country by stating that it will be the intention of the House not to sit on 23 July, when Prince Andrew marries Miss Sarah Ferguson?

Mr. Biffen: For the headline of this afternoon or this morning, I congratulate my hon. Friend. All I can say is that that particular privilege is not within my gift. However, I take account of his concern. As he would rightly observe, we have far fewer public holidays than do most countries on the continent of Europe. This provides a chance to redress the imbalance.

As to the question of local authority behaviour and the use of the rates, my hon. Friend took part—I think formidably and constructively—in our debate earlier this week. I cannot guarantee very much shortly after our return. However, as the Leader of the Opposition has reminded us, a debate on the Green Paper will be required at some point.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): The Leader of the House mentioned the Fulham by-election. He will probably not remember, because he was in his pram at the time, that the last time that the Labour party fought a by-election in Fulham was when Edith Summerskill kicked out the Tories in the 1938 by-election and gained a massive majority. That was the last time that Labour won the seat from the Tories in Fulham. No doubt that event will be repeated when we fight the Fulham by-election in about two weeks' time.

What I really want to ask the Leader of the House is this. He has no doubt held many interesting conversations with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy on the vexed question of the colliery review procedure. I have asked him about this on several occasions. Only today, one of my hon. Friends asked him a further question about it. The Leader of the House says that he speaks for the Secretary of State for Energy on this procedure. What do the Government intend to do about it? Do they intend to maintain the existing machinery in reference to pit closures, or is it to be dismantled or amended? What steps are the Government taking? The procedure is falling wholly into disrepute. The National Coal Board does not pay any attention to the recommendations, and the Leader of the House guffaws, smirks and simpers. However, this is a very serious matter for the coal miners, who are affected by a ferocious programme of pit closures. What is the Government's position, briefly?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman very generously draws attention to the gap in our ages, which I acknowledge. I should only like to plead in self-defence that there is no corresponding gap in maturity. As to the independent review body, only my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy can state the Government's policy on this matter. I shall represent to him the concern, which I know extends beyond the hon. Gentleman, that a statement should be made on this matter.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): In relation to the next allotted day for the alliance, does my right hon. Friend, whose Tory credentials are impeccable, agree, in the light of the answer that he gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth), after reading the recently published book by the leader of the Social Democratic Party, "A United Kingdom", that he pinched for one of his chapters the title "Trust the People", a phrase of Lord Randolph Churchill, and that many of the policies contained in the book could easily have been written by a five year old?

Mr. Biffen: I am not sure how that relates to Lord Randolph Churchill. The fascinating contribution of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) is a clear indication that he is paving the way to a Labour party which is bereft of Militant, so that the real challenge from the Left in this country will come from an increasingly united alliance and Labour party.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call those hon. Members who have been standing, but we must finish these questions at 11 o'clock, so may we have questions about business next week and not about the Fulham by-election or about books that we might read during the recess?

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Is the Leader of the House aware that most people in this country view with abhorrence President Reagan's support of terrorism in Nicaragua and Angola and American aggression in the Mediterranean? Will he therefore give a more positive response to the request of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition that, as a matter of urgency, there should be a foreign policy debate in the House?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is entitled to observe that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) takes a fairly acerbic view of the American action in Libya and that in that he is joined by the Leader of the Opposition. That is a reasonable political observation. It underlines the variety and the interest that there will be in a foreign affairs debate. I have said that this matter will be considered through the usual channels, and so it shall.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): To support the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), will the right hon. Gentleman draw the attention of the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to early-day motion 553, which has been signed by 46 hon. Members, and early-day motion 619, which has been signed by 49 hon. Members?

[That this House recognises the need to achieve a peaceful solution to the problems of Central America; is aware of the importance of the recently signed Carablleda Declaration calling on the end to all foreign aid to irregular forces operating in Central America, the progressive elimination of all foreign forces in the region and the reduction of arms acquisitions; is further aware of the repeated calls of the Contadora countries to cease United States funding of the Contras and of the well-documented, appalling human rights violations by the Contras; calls on the United States Congress to reject President Reagan's request for increased aid, including military aid, to the Contras; calls on the United Kingdom Government to join with other European Economic Community countries to oppose publicly the request for military and other aid; and calls on the United States Administration to stop all efforts designed to bring down the Nicaraguan Government and to resume direct bilateral talks with the Nicaraguan Government which have been unilaterally suspended by the United States of America.]

[That this House is alarmed at the recent revelation of activity by the Contras against the democratically elected government of Nicaragua; is appalled that on 25th January 1985 in Waslala, Zelaya, a group of civilian travellers and children were ambushed on their way to meet President Ortega; is horrified that on 29th June 1984, Paco Sivilla, a teacher from Brownback, was hunted by a group of Contras and his ears, tongue and private parts cut off before he was brutally murdered; is shocked that in July 1984 Adám Flores, a 70-year-old man, was murdered by a force of 70 Contras; further believes that these are a few examples of the most appalling murders by Contra forces against the people of Nicaragua; believes that President Reagan's attempts to send a further $100 million in aid to the Contras can only continue the war and result in further murders of the Nicaraguan people; and accordingly demands that Her Majesty's Government put all possible pressure on President Reagan to cease all support for the Contras and respect the territorial integrity and peaceful wishes of the people of Nicaragua.]

They concern United States support for Contra violence in South America. Will the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary tell the United States that its policies in central America are leading to death, to a continuation of murder and maiming of people and to the invasion of a democratic sovereign country? These matters are important to western Europe and the United Kingdom and should be debated as soon as we return after the Easter recess.

Mr. Biffen: The Leader of the Opposition mentioned Nicaragua as one of the area of conflict that he should like to see included in a foreign affairs debate. I am sure that the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) has taken note of that comment. He may have noted that on Wednesday 9 April, the day on which we return, Foreign and Commonwealth Office questions are at the top of the list.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): If I heard the Leader of the House correctly, he said that we shall consider the remaining stages of the Armed Forces bill on Thursday of the week in which we return. As a member of the Standing Committee on the Bill, I think I am right in saying that the report of the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill will be published on the Wednesday. In view of the disquiet surrounding the chairmanship and deliberations of that Committee, would it not have been more fair and reasonable to allow the House time to debate the report before scrutinising the Bill?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is a fair controversialist. If from his position here he talks of "disquiet" about the conduct of the Chair, he should either make it clear that he is trying to censure the Chair or accept that the decisions at which the Chair arrived were in order. I take note of what the hon. Gentleman said about the Committee's report being followed immediately by consideration of the remaining stages of the Bill. I think that the situation is manageable.

Honourable Members (Access to House)

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At the beginning of each Parliament, resolutions are passed on free and easy access to the House. When I arrived today at Carriage Gate, I was told by a policeman that I should wait because the Prime Minister's car was due to arrive. If a car—whether the Prime Minister's or any other person's—was due to arrive immediately, I would hardly need the caution of a policeman. Because the policeman was so insistent that I should wait, I did so; but the Prime Minister's car did not arrive for a good one minute. I had said to the policeman that Question Time was due to begin, but it made no impression on him. May I take it that the Prime Minister is given such special preferential treatment that hon. Members are supposed to wait at Carriage Gate until her car arrives in due course?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the policeman was looking after the hon. Member's health to ensure that he arrived here safely before Question Time. I shall, of course, look into the matter.

Armed Forces Bill

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Further to the answers given by the Leader of the House to my hon. Friends the Members for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) and for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) on the Armed Forces Bill, we have a problem because we shall not be able to draft amendments to the Bill in the light of the Select Committee's report until less than 24 hours before we debate the Bill. Will you accept amendments much later than normal?

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Member. I had already picked up that message in the earlier exchanges. I shall certainly do that.

BILL PRESENTED

EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES (AMENDMENT)

Mrs. Lynda Chalker, supported by the Prime Minister, Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Hurd, Mr. Secretary Walker, Mr. Michael Jopling, Mr. Secretary Ridley, Mr. Secretary Baker, Mr. Kenneth Clarke, Mr. Secretary Channon and Mr. Attorney-General, presented a Bill to amend the European Communities Act 1972 so as to include in the definition of "the Treaties" and "the Community Treaties" certain provisions of the Single European Act signed at Luxembourg and The Hague on 17 and 28 February 1986 and extend certain provisions relating to the European Court to any court attached thereto; and to amend references to the Assembly of the European Communities and approve the Single European Act: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Tuesday 8 April and to be printed. [Bill 126.]

PETITIONS

Social Security

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): I seek leave to present a petition on behalf of 5,000 of my constituents. It explains that legislation based on the "Reform of Social Security — Progamme for Action" White Paper would be extremely detrimental to many of the poor, not only in Ayrshire but in the United Kingdom. The good and sensible people of Ayrshire have appended their names to the petition in the hope that the House will take note of the request that the Social Security Bill should not go forward to Third Reading.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): I seek leave to present a petition, with which I wish to be associated, on behalf of the elderly people of Dundee who are concerned at the review of the social security system outlined in the Fowler review paper. There are 150,000 elderly persons in Scotland who receive supplementary benefit and a further 75,000 who do not claim supplementary benefit. Rather than seek to review the supplementary benefit system to cut benefits, these elderly people in Dundee would be much better off if the Secretary of State for Social Security carried out a review to ensure that the 75,000 people entitled to claim supplementary benefit receive it and to ensure that benefits are increased. I am sure that hon. Members agree. On behalf of those people, I ask the Minister not to proceed with the review.

To lie upon the Table.

Police Complaints Authority

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Donald Thompson.]

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of the House to the fact that this debate started five minutes later than I had hoped. The first debate will therefore have to end shortly after 11.30 am. I hope that we shall make up time later in the other debates.

11.6 am

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I preface my comments in this now shortened debate by saying that it is with considerable regret that I have to raise the issue of the police complaints procedure and specifically as it applies to the inquiry into the events surrounding the visit by the former Home Secretary to Manchester university at the beginning of March last year.

The Minister of State will be aware that in the past 12 months I and my colleagues have expressed our concern at those events. On 14 March 1985 my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) asked for an independent public inquiry into the actions of the police. The Minister responded by saying that he felt that the existing complaints procedure was perfectly satisfactory. Since then, the report of the independent inquiry set up by Manchester—the so-called Platts-Mills inquiry—has been published. The inquiry made serious allegations to which there has not been, to date, a proper answer from any of the authorities.

I am grateful for the fact that The Guardian has published over the past four days a series of articles which have brought the events up to date and given voice to further extremely serious allegations about events in the area policed by the Greater Manchester police.

The Opposition Front Bench endorses my attempts to seek answers to these serious allegations. I should like to get to the bottom of these allegations to ascertain whether we can restore the concept of justice in an area where many people would claim that it has not been forthcoming. We seek to offer protection to a number of the people who have been involved in these events in the past 12 months.

I do not want this debate to turn into a generalised police-bashing exercise. I am conscious of the fact that, if that happened, the Minister might be forced to take a defensive position. I do not want that. I do not intend to make generalised criticisms of the Greater Manchester police or of the chief constable, but I cannot shirk my responsibility to the area that I represent. Parliament cannot shirk its responsibility, and to that extent I have the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House. There are some serious matters that demand our attention.

I know the Minister well enough, after our contacts on different occasions, to know that he is extremely serious about wanting adequate policing of our cities. I know that he will take my comments seriously, and I say that with a degree of respect in advance of his reply to my speech. I do not think that the House wants anodyne answers, and I do not mean that unkindly. It would not be sufficient simply to refer us back to the existing police complaints procedure, because the allegations that have been made are now too serious simply to palm matters off for a further few months.

Individual policemen have been involved in events of an extremely sinister and serious nature. I am suggesting that the inquiry that has been established has been reluctant to take action on a number of matters, and some people interpret that as meaning that the inquiry is simply covering up the extremely serious behaviour of the individuals involved. I regret to say that I think that the inquiry to date has been incompetent in the prosecution of its task. In making that charge, I must tell the Minister that the whole of the complaints procedure is now also on trial.

This is the first inquiry under the new procedures, and is almost certainly one of the most important inquiries with which the procedures will have to deal for some considerable time. To an extent, I hope we can all accept that, whatever our different views on the matter, this is a matter of fundamental importance both to policing specifically and to the control that society exercises over that policing.

I do not want to dwell upon the events of 1 March last year, because, although they are still important, they have been out-distanced by subsequent events, and specifically they have been out-distanced by what has happened to at least two of the students involved. Over the past year they have suffered what The Guardian has described as a "systematic campaign of intimidation". They have been harassed and attacked. It can only be accepted that the harassment and attacks have been systematic and have led to the students living in a climate of fear. They have suffered appallingly over that period. It is our duty and that of the police to protect society and individuals against such fear. Manifestly, that has not happened in this case.

I should like to refer specifically to Sarah Hollis. I should not have referred to Sarah Hollis had her circumstances not been widely reported already in the press. She has suffered considerable anxiety, fear and brutal attacks over the past 12 months. She was publicly injured at the time of the former Home Secretary's visit to Manchester university and she made a formal complaint to her Member of Parliament at that time.

That was followed by what can only be described as the persecution of Sarah. Specifically, she was followed by marked police vehicles, and she claimed to have received anonymous telephone calls at different times of the day and night. While riding her bicycle, she was stopped by motorcycle policemen for alleged offences. Most important, her house was burgled in June. Various items were taken, including two witness statements about the former Home Secretary's visit and a number of her membership cards of various quasi-political organisations, for example, the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament.

Subsequent to that burglary, Sarah visited the then head of the police team inquiring into this matter, Deputy Chief Constable Reddington, of the Somerset and Avon police force. The Platts-Mills inquiry stated on the basis of Sarah Hollis's evidence:

> "In the presence of Mr. Reddington, a witness statement was taken from her as to the events of 1 March, and the injuries from which she had suffered. This was done by Detective Inspector Edwards. On completion of the witness statement, Mr. Reddington indicated that he was aware that Sarah Hollis had other matters to raise. She mentioned the harassment and the burglary. Mr. Reddington began to shout at her, asking whether she was alleging that it was police officers who had done this. Not surprisingly she burst into tears and left the room."

Inspector Edwards later confided to her that this was necessary to establish whether she was telling the truth about the burglary.

That alleged behaviour by the head of the inquiry is not suitable or fitting for an independent inquiry, and is unacceptable by any standards. Sarah subsequently went into hiding, with the result that when she came out of hiding the harassment continued. Finally, in January of this year, she was attacked and punched, with led to her receiving a severely injured eye. She believes that the person who attacked her was the man who had previously threatened her, and she believes that that man is a policeman.

Following that, Sarah withdrew all co-operation from the various inquiries taking place. It might be possible to argue that as Sarah has twice now withdrawn her co-operation, she is an unreliable witness. I would suggest that it is far more plausible to argue that she is a very frightened young woman.

I should now like to consider the case of Mr. Steven Shaw, another of those involved in the former Home Secretary's visit to Manchester. Steven spoke at a meeting shortly after the former Home Secretary's visit which discussed non-co-operation with the police inquiry and advocated co-operation with an inquiry set up by the police monitoring unit of the city of Manchester. Subsequently, Steven's thesis was stolen. He informed his professor at the university and Mr. Steve Wright of the police monitoring unit of the theft. However, he did not inform the police. Several days later he was picked up for speeding and taken to Longsight police station, where he was greeted by the desk sergeant who said that he, Steven, was the chap making allegations about his thesis.

It is obviously very serious for me to suggest that the police somehow knew about the thesis, as Steven had not told them about it. Steven suffered a horrific beating at Bootle street police station and was hospitalised. He did not co-operate with Somerset and Avon inquiry until earlier this year. Shortly after co-operating with that inquiry, Steven received another severe beating, with the result that he again had to spend some time in hospital. He was badly injured and no doubt the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman), Mr. Shaw's Member of Parliament, will make some comments about that.

There have been allegations that the police used unmarked police cars, but the registration numbers of the cars clearly showed that they were registered with the police and were used for surveillance. There is a serious allegation that the burglary at Sarah Hollis's flat was, to some extent, organised by the police. Mr. Frank Logan, who was convicted of that burglary, alleges, and has sworn an affidavit to this effect, that the police put it into his mind that he should rob that flat. Mr. Logan also said that at no time did he or his accomplice take any papers from Sarah's flat. That is a clear implication that someone else also entered Sarah Hollis's flat at the same time to obtain the witness statements.

The Avon and Somerset inquiry, as I have said, has started off on the wrong foot and has generated no confidence whatsoever. There is a degree of scepticism among the students involved, which is vindicated to the extent that when Frank Logan was questioned by Inspector Edwards about the burglary at Sarah Hollis's flat he was asked whether students had put him up to the burglary. The Guardian made the point that when Steven Shaw was beaten, the Somerset and Avon police were asked to look into the matter, and a senior officer from Avon and Somerset police told a solicitor recently that he was getting nowhere because he could not find a motive for the attack on Steven Shaw.

Statements of events at and around the time of the Home Secretary's visit were handed over by the independent inquiry to the prosecution, but not to the defence. That is an extremely serious charge of lack of impartiality, and has itself resulted in a complaint to the independent inquiry.

To date there have been no charges, no convictions and no obvious sense of urgency in relation to the attacks on witnesses. I have already commented on the relationship of Deputy Chief Constable Reddington with Sarah Hollis. In July last year he told The Guardian:

"We have not received any complaints about policemen persecuting students."

As that was some months after he interviewed Sarah Hollis, that comment belies the true events.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Does my hon. Friend recall the wide disquiet in recent months about incidents in my constituency, including the assault on five youngsters by police officers in Holloway? Does he agree that that clearly shows the need for a fully independent system to investigate complaints about the police?

Mr. Lloyd: I heartily endorse that view. I understand that my hon. Friend's constituents were invited to meet the Home Secretary.

In a letter to The Guardian today, Sarah Hollis concludes:

"When I read the article on Monday I was extremely frightened for my own safety as a consequence of its publication."

Does the Minister agree that the same protection should be offered to Sarah Hollis and that he or his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary should agree to meet her?

I shall put a number of questions to the Minister formally at a later stage. Clearly the issues that have been raised are of the utmost importance. So far there have been no charges. We expect charges to be made, because the police do not have to wait until the independent inquiry is concluded. It is a matter of grave concern that the assaults on witnesses seem to have received inadequate attention from the police, who seem not to have pursued their inquiries with any diligence, leading not just to a certain cynicism among those involved, but to widespread concern that there is an attempt to cover up the truth. Parliament cannot allow such an attempt to succeed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): As we are behind schedule, I hope that hon. Members will be brief so that we can make up the lost time.

11.22 am

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I am extremely grateful to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd). It is typical of his courtesy and consideration that he informed me that he would be seeking to raise this matter today. I am grateful to him because one of the principal witnesses whom he mentioned is a constituent of mine.

I am second to no one in my admiration for the police forces of this country, who have to do a difficult, dangerous and occasionally dirty job, but that is not to assert that every officer necessarily acts with impeccable propriety on every occasion. There may be bad eggs in any profession or occupation. It causes me deep concern and disquiet that my constituent, having been invited for interview at a police station in Manchester, where he was interviewed for five hours, was stripped and searched and, he claims, assaulted. I understand that no doctor was present. Certainly my constituent had to be taken to hospital, where internal rupture necessitated two operations.

Subsequently, my constituent was interviewed at his home in my constituency by the Avon and Somerset police for 17 hours, involving the preparation of a 58-page statement. He was advised to return to Manchester to check some statements with witnesses, and he did so. On the second day following his return he was attacked on the street outside the place where he was staying by, he claims, two people who assaulted him on the first occasion. His nose was broken, a cigarette end was burnt into his face, he was hit with a bottle, trodden on and punched, necessitating his being taken to hospital for treatment, after which he had to be brought by ambulance to his home in my constituency.

Four days later, the Avon and Somerset police spent a further 10 hours taking statements from my constituent. Since then he has received two death threats—one by telephone and one by letter. I implore my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that the fullest inquiries are carried out into these complaints. I believe that it is as much in the interests of the police forces of our country as of anyone else that the truth of these matters should be discovered.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) for raising this issue and to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) for his contribution in respect of his constituent. As the House will recognise, the incident at Manchester university is the subject of a major inquiry currently under the auspices of the deputy chief constable of the South Wales police force and supervised by the Police Complaints Authority. I shall briefly put on record the chronology of events.

The incident took place on 1 March 1985. The first complaints were received by the chief constable of Greater Manchester in the early days of that month and the deputy chief constable of Avon and Somerset, Mr. Reddington, was appointed to investigate. He arrived in Manchester to start work on 11 March. As the House knows, the Police Complaints Authority was not established until 29 April, so the initial inquiry was under the previous arrangements. On 5 May a complaint which had only then been made to the Greater Manchester police was referred to the Police Complaints Authority to consider supervision of its investigation. The authority immediately decided to undertake supervision of that complaint and of all others stemming from events at the students union on 1 March.

I understand that 30 individual complaints were lodged formally with the Greater Manchester police about the conduct of police officers involved in the demonstration and that 68 general complaints have been made by members of the public. Statements from witnesses included references to a further 74 incidents which, in the view of the investigating officers, merit examination at the very least as criticisms of police conduct. In other words, 172 complaints or allegations are part of the inquiry for which the Police Complaints Authority is responsible.

So far, 540 civilian witnesses have made statements to the inquiry team. In addition, statements have been taken from 217 police officers and the team has not yet finished interviewing. That means a total of 757 witnesses. The whole inquiry has involved a team of 10 to 12 officers working full time since last March.

I wish to say categorically to the hon. Member for Stretford and to the House that there is no question of dilatoriness or attempted cover-up, but of total commitment to optimise the amount of investigation that must take place to try to reach conclusions on the basis of the broad range of complaints that have been registered. From September 1985, Mr. Reddington took up another post and was replaced as head of the inquiry by Mr. Vickers, deputy chief constable of South Wales.

The hon. Member for Stretford reasonably asks why no conclusion has yet been reached. The fault lies not with the officers or with the Police Complaints Authority, which is supervising the investigation very closely, but with the students who wished to make complaints about police conduct. As the hon. Member for Stretford said, after the incident Manchester city council decided to establish its own inquiry into the events of 1 March. That inquiry was set up under the chairmanship of Mr. Platts-Mills, QC. As I understand it, the students union in Manchester thereupon resolved that no student complainant about the events of 1 March should make a statement to the police investigation until the Platts-Mills inquiry had reported. In other cases, students involved in criminal proceedings declined—as they have every right to do—to give statements for the purpose of the inquiry until the criminal proceedings had been completed.

The result of all that was that, although the inquiry team was able to take statements from about 300 witnesses in the first six months of the investigation, none were from the most important complainants. In effect, the inquiry proceeded with one hand tied firmly behind its back at least until November last year. That was the major component in the significant delay, if delay it be, in the handling of the inquiry.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the serious incidents that have been the subject of allegations in The Guardian and have emerged from the inquiry—the alleged attacks on and harassment of Sarah Hollis and Steven Shaw, who is a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet. Here again the inquiry team has been hampered in not being able to take timely statements from those two people.

In Mr. Shaw's case, the inquiry team was initially working on the basis of evidence published in the report of the Platts-Mills inquiry and in the media. As I understand it, Mr. Shaw's solicitor was reluctant to allow him to make any statement to the investigating officers until 22 January 1986. Miss Hollis has still made no statement about her allegations of harassment to the inquiry team, which is thus unable to take its investigation very far forward at present. In order to assist it as far as she is willing, Miss Hollis has indicated that she would allow the team to have access to the evidence that she gave to the Platts-Mills inquiry, to which I have referred. That evidence rests, as I understand it, with the Manchester city council. The head of the inquiry team has twice written to the council seeking access to, in particular, Miss Hollis's evidence, but also to any other evidence relevant to these inquiries.

[Mr. Giles Shaw]

In addition, the Police Complaints Authority itself has written to the council making the same request. No reply has been received to any of those letters. I must ask the hon. Member for Stretford — for whom I have considerable respect — whether he can facilitate the inquiry and help it to come to a speedier conclusion by encouraging Manchester city council to respond positively to the request made to it, rather than suggesting—as I think he did—that the inquiry is getting nowhere fast and that the reasons must rest fundamentally with the provision of essential evidence.

I have read the letter in The Guardian this morning, in which Miss Hollis gives her views. I have carefully studied recent articles in The Guardian. They contain serious allegations. The allegations will receive the thorough investigation that they so clearly deserve, but that is difficult to achieve in the absence of full assistance from the subjects of the alleged complaints and, in particular, from Miss Hollis.

I note from Miss Hollis's letter published this morning that she regrets the publication without either her knowledge or agreement of matters discussed in confidence with another person. If The Guardian has any new evidence at all on these matters—and some of what has been published appeared some months ago in the Platts-Mills report — it should pass it to the Police Complaints Authority or to the deputy chief constable of South Wales who is leading the investigation. I understand that The Guardian claims that some information has been sent to the authority. I am not sure what it is, and I understand that it has yet to arrive.

The position in this inquiry is far from easy. The inquiry is of the utmost importance and the broadest scope. We intend to ensure that the Police Complaints Authority, with the powers that Parliament has given it, should produce a thorough and full investigation into every aspect of the complaints. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the Police Complaints Authority has already been involved in major incidents. There were the inquiries into the shooting of the Shorthouse boy in Birmingham, into the shooting of Mrs. Groce and into the death of Mrs. Jarrett. The authority handled those major complaints in a thoroughly effective and professional manner.

I give the hon. Gentleman the commitment that he wishes me to give. I will personally see to it that the Police Complaints Authority does its job with the effectiveness, thoroughness and probity that Parliament demands of it. However, the hon. Gentleman should understand how difficult that is to achieve in the absence of clear statements of evidence, clear support of the allegations and, above all else, the opportunity to question those most critically involved in the major allegations.

The Police Complaints Authority has been established for less than a year, and I am bound to record that its record under the chairmanship of Sir Cecil Clothier demonstrates its successful determination to serve the public with fairness and dispatch.

Helicopter and Aircraft Noise

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): I am most grateful for the opportunity to raise the problem of aircraft and helicopter noise. This is of great concern to thousands of my constituents. No one who lacks the experience of living under the noise shadow of a major airport such as Heathrow should ever dream of belittling the impact on those who live nearby. In the hurly-burly of modern life, people long for peace and quiet in their own homes. Aircraft noise can ruin people's quiet enjoyment of their houses and gardens. That is especially true in summer when people are in their gardens or are more likely to open their windows. Aircraft noise interferes with the work of schools, offices, hospitals and, on Sundays, of churches. It can have an impact on private conversations, including telephone conversations, on people's private lives and on their enjoyment of music.

Some people do not mind aircraft noise very much, but to a major and significant proportion it is extremely annoying. Experiments carried out by the consultant psychiatrist at the West Middlesex hospital have proved that it can even lead to mental illness.

People can look to courts of law for protection against other forms of noise nuisance, but in the Civil Aviation Act 1949 Parliament expressly ruled out that protection in the case of aircraft and helicopter noise. That being so, people can do no other than look to the Government and Parliament for that protection against the nuisance of noise which in other cases is enshrined in English law so that people are entitled to expect the quiet enjoyment of their own houses. The Government therefore have a special duty to have regard to the impact of aircraft noise on householders.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): All that my hon. Friend says is absolutely right. People in my own constituency suffer from all the annoyances that he has described. Noise induces illnesses other than mental illness. Furthermore, because of the heavy use of Heathrow and the growing use of Northolt airport there is very heavy traffic on the roads. People cannot use the roads effectively and they suffer additional noise pollution from the roads.

Mr. Jessel: That is all true. My hon. Friend has been very active in connection with the environment in Ealing and the noise from aircraft and road traffic.

Unlike airline companies and airport authorities, householders who live under the flight paths cannot afford to employ expensive lobbyists or public relations firms. That, too, means that the Government have a duty to pay additional regard to the views of those hon. Members who represent people living under the flight paths. I hope that the Minister will confirm, on behalf of the Government, that he and the Secretary of State should always keep in the forefront of their minds a distinct and determined resolve to safeguard the interests of those who live below the flight paths and will confirm that those interests will always be upheld by the Government.

Over the years hon. Members with constituencies close to Heathrow have campaigned ceaselessly to curb the curse of aircraft noise. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There is also my hon.

Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Mather) my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Hayhoe), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground), my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) my right hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins), and my hon. Friends the Members for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton), for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn), for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and for Ealing, North. My late colleague Mr. Martin Stevens, as hon. Member for Fulham, was always assiduous in his efforts not only to contain aircraft noise but to mitigate the terrible road traffic effects along Cromwell road. Cromwell road, which passes through Fulham, is the main radial route between central London and Heathrow airport. It is greatly affected by the growth of traffic that has been generated by the airport.

We have all tried to contain airport traffic and the size of Heathrow, to make aircraft engines quieter and to cut night flights. Several of the hon. Members whom I mentioned are Ministers in other Departments or Whips who, by convention, do not speak on these matters on the Floor of the House. However, they have made their views known behind the scenes consistently and with great force. Together we have had some effect. Aircraft engines are slowly becoming quieter through the certification system and in the 1970s most of the night flights were banned —although the number has started to creep up again, which gives my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes great concern. I hope this will be stopped.

Last year the Government decided, against the advice of their inspector, to refuse planning permission for a fifth terminal at Heathrow. That courageous decision was widely applauded throughout west London and showed that the Government put peace, quiet and the health of the people above commercial interests. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary can confirm that the Government do not intend to waver on that position.

Next, I turn to the helicopter route between Heathrow and Gatwick. The noise of helicopters is unpleasant, whirring and penetrating, and many of my constituents find it thoroughly offensive and irritating. We would be willing to suppress our feelings if that helicopter route were somehow essential to the defence of the nation, or crucial to the fundamental wealth and prosperity of our country, but it is not.

Each year that route would be used by only 90,000 passengers of the 47 million who pass through the south-eastern airports of Heathrow, Gatwick, Luton and Stansted. That is one in 500, and is only about one in 40 even of the annual growth in the number of passengers through airports in the south-east. It is intolerable to suggest that the peace and quiet of tens of thousands of people living, working, enjoying their gardens and going about their daily lives below should be systematically interrupted to save 20 people 20 minutes each. That cannot be allowed. It must be stopped permanently.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): is my hon. Friend aware that that service generates about £24 million for the airlines concerned, and constitutes only 20 per cent. of the helicopter traffic that operates in the area? Does he agree that the prosperous south-east owes much of its prosperity to the existence of sophisticated air transport facilities? Is he aware that my constituents in the hard-pressed midlands are accepting a motorway in the national interest, and will take a dim view if this national asset were stopped?

Mr. Jessel: There are many motorways in the midlands and the north which do a great deal towards the prosperity of the midlands and the north, and which are an essential part of the infrastructure required to generate employment in the provinces, which all hon. Members wish to see. I do not believe that the helicopter route generates a profit of £24 million. Is that sum a profit or turnover?

Mr. Howarth: The £24 million is revenue — turnover.

Mr. Jessel: In that case the route does not make £24 million in profit, as substantial costs must be involved. The profit must be far less than £24 million. Indeed, I imagine that it is only £1 million or £2 million. It is wholly unreasonable every day to expect tens of thousands of people to endure that horrible noise to generate £1 million or £2 million of profit for an airline. Moreover, I cannot see that it is doing anything whatever for the people of the midlands. On the contrary, it is attracting more activity to the south-east.

The Government must take note of the strong feelings. People will be furious if the Secretary of State fails to hold to the extremely wise, sensible decision that he announced to the House in June 1984, that four months after the opening of the south-west section of the M25, which was to link Heathrow and Gatwick, these helicopter flights would be stopped.

This February my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State together with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State were kind enough to see a delegation led by my right hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne and including my hon. Friends the Members for Epsom and Ewell, for Esher, for Woking (Mr. Onslow), for Reigate (Mr. Gardiner) and me, on that matter so that we could put to them our deep concern on behalf of our constituents. My constituents in Hampton and the Hampton Hill area would be affected by the helicopter flight path.

The Secretary of State was acting in a quasi-judicial capacity, as there has recently been a public inquiry. However, it was conducted by a biased body because the Civil Aviation Authority exists for aviation and is unfitted to carry out an impartial inquiry. My right hon. Friend could only listen to us, could make no comment, and did not bat an eyelid, properly, apparently impervious to our onslaught. I am sure that he and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State must have taken note of the strong case that we put to them.

Our case was that the decision in June 1984 to stop helicopter flights four months after the opening of the relevant section of the M25 should be sustained, and that the flights should not be reintroduced. That section of the M25 was opened in October 1985 and the flights stopped in February 1986. That decision was right at the time. Nothing has happened since to change its rightness. It remains right today.

On 11 November 1985 I asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he had made of the long-term benefits of the M25 circular motorway round London. He replied:

"The M25 will provide a more convenient, quicker and safer route round London for through traffic. It will give easier access to ports and airports . . . and will relieve communities in London and the south-east of through traffic, noise and congestion."—[Official Report, 11 November 1985; Vol. 86, c. 297.]

[Mr. Jessel]

Thus, the Secretary of State stated that part of the purpose of the M25 is to relieve people of noise. He did not say the noise of motor vehicles only, but noise. Noise includes aircraft and helicopter noise. Therefore, the huge public investment in the M25 will be partly wasted if it is not fully used to reduce the impact of noise, including helicopter noise, on my constituents and those of other hon. Members who live between Heathrow and Gatwick.

The distance between Heathrow and Gatwick is only 40 miles. Express buses operate at most times of the day and can make the journey in 40 minutes. Sometimes the M25 is crowded, but 98 per cent. of the buses complete the journey in less than 60 minutes. There are five buses an hour, that is one every 12 minutes, so the average waiting time is six minutes. Therefore, the average time of the journey, including waiting time, is just under one hour. A helicopter takes 20 minutes, the gap between them would be 40 minutes, so the average waiting time would be 20 minutes. Including the waiting time for the helicopter, passengers would take on average 40 to 45 minutes for the journey. The whole thing is nonsense. Passengers will save only 10 or 15 minutes. They could brag to their business colleagues or to their children that they had been in a helicopter, but the real benefit is quite negligible. There is no justification for the disturbance this would cause, and I hope the Secretary of State will give short shrift to the impertinent application to renew the service.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) for allowing me a couple of minutes to make four or five brief points. It is typical of his dedication that, having attracted the good fortune of an Adjournment debate, he should choose a subject of great sensitivity, one that is perhaps of the highest importance for people living in the borough of Richmond upon Thames. Many of the problems that my hon. Friend mentioned are experienced by people throughout the borough and the House will know that there is no matter of greater concern to my constituents. Indeed, it was the subject of my maiden speech and has been the subject of four further speeches since then.

I will not repeat what my hon. Friend has said. I agree thoroughly with every word that he has uttered. This morning in my house in Barnes I was woken up by aircraft noise merely because last night was somewhat milder than many of the nights we have had of late. I forecast the misery that many of my constituents will suffer throughout the summer—to dare to open a window at night will mean lost sleep.

My five points are these. First of all, there is now serious bunching of night flights. The numbers of night flights is ever-increasing, there is a de facto reduction in the hours of restriction and when Concorde comes over early in the morning, people find it difficult to get back to sleep and are all the more conscious of those flights.

In his letter of 27 January my hon. Friend the Minister said:

"On the 5th of December last year after the arrival of Concorde at 4.14 in the morning there were 16 further landings before the end of the night restrictions period at 6.30 hours."

He went on to say:

"It is not at all unusual for a number of other aircraft to arrive at Heathrow between 4 a.m. and 6.30 hours. Indeed, between these hours 15 aeroplanes landed on the 3rd December, 12 on the 2nd December, 11 on the 6th December, and 15 on the 8th December."

That is the Minister's own admission of the fact that the restriction on night flights has failed. Secondly, the number of flights in all has increased. We know that the Government had a commitment to the 285,000 air traffic movements limit at Heathrow. They dropped that because the Liberals, Labour and certain Conservatives voted against the Bill in Parliament. However, the Government were committed to that ATM policy on environmental grounds. Once the Bill had been defeated, they ditched that policy because of political problems over Stansted. They had the policy to start with and for that reason they should continue with it. Air traffic movements have now increased close to 300,000 and the figure is getting near to the danger limit of 310,000.

Thirdly, what has happened to the use of alternate runways? I should like my hon. Friend to look at that. Fourthly, there is the problem of helicopters. My constituency is not particularly affected by the Heathrow-Gatwick link, but it would be greatly affected by any link between the City of London and Heathrow. That link would cross Barnes and Kew, and I warn my hon. Friend that if he puts forward any proposal for a helicopter link between the City of London and Heathrow, he will be opposed not only by the people of Richmond and Barnes and Twickenham but by people in all the constituencies west of the City.

My last point is that on the demise of the GLC the aircraft noise-line will go. I urge my hon. Friend to seek every possible way of getting the noise-line back. An example of its effectiveness is that between July 1984 and October 1985, 1,404 calls were made on that line. Most of them had to do with late night or early morning flights. In the battle against aircraft noise it is vital—if my hon. Friend wants to remove the emotion and what is sometimes looked upon as unreasonable belief — that there are accurate data about night flights. That noise-line produced accurate data, and perhaps more than any other service of the GLC my constituents will miss that facility—unless the scientific services branch is replaced elsewhere. I beg my hon. Friend to look at night flights. I have been to see him with representatives from HACAN, the Heathrow Association for the Control of Aircraft Noise to discuss these matters. I beg my hon. Friend to consider his views yet again.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): First of all, I should like to direct the attention of my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) to section 76 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982. That section does not exclude all liability of aircraft operators for trespass and nuisance caused by aircraft in flight. The exemption applies only to aircraft flying at a reasonable height and complying with all the air navigation rules. Successive Governments have for many years taken the view that the problems posed by aircraft noise are in general best dealt with by taking and enforcing all practicable measures to ensure that the disturbance caused is minimised, bearing in mind the proper demands of the civil aviation industry.

A special point I should like to make in response to my hon. Friends the Members for Twickenham and for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) who spoke about the general responsibilities of the Government, is that I fully recognise that a Government as committed as we are to the success and expansion of aviation must, perhaps more than any other Government, be aware of and be prepared to respond to the anxieties in the public mind about aircraft noise. One of our priorities must be to tackle the problem at source, to determine which aircraft we shall allow to operate in the United Kingdom and for how long. As my hon. Friends will know, non-noise-certificated jet aeroplanes on the United Kingdom register were banned on 1 January, a full year ahead of most other European countries. We are committed to a similar ban on all such foreign registered aeroplanes from 1 January 1988.

Internationally, we are playing an important part in looking for a way to phase out the so-called chapter two jet aeroplanes, and I am pleased with the co-operation that we have received from the industry, even though it could have cost implications for some airlines. Noise standards generally will be reviewed from time to time and I shall take whatever steps are necessary, either domestically or internationally, to ensure that the controls are as stringent as possible, bearing in mind that they have to be technically feasible and economically reasonable.

Helicopters have long been a source of disturbance to some people and my hon. Friends talked about that. Helicopters have so far been able to operate without standards to govern them. International agreement is essential, and I am pleased to say that ICAO has now issued specific standards that we will adopt in the next few months. I am sure these will be environmentally beneficial and will be welcomed by my hon. Friends.

Regrettably, noise standards do not of themselves totally solve the problem. People, including those in my hon. Friends' constituencies, will continue to experience some discomfort from aircraft noise, even after we have done what we can through noise standards. Their burden can and must be eased by the implementation not only of noise standards but of operational measures such as quiet take-off and approach procedures.

At the airports designated under section 80 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982, Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted—the first of which applies to the constituencies of my hon. Friends—the Secretary of State and I have direct noise abatement responsibility. This responsibility will not be changed in any way by the privatisation of the British Airports Authority. It is essential that noise abatement measures are thoroughly reappraised from time to time. That is why the Government have embarked on important reviews about our responsibilities at designated airports. In answer to my hon. Friends, I can say that these reviews include noise monitoring, night restrictions, noise insulation and noise measurement.

All these reviews are progressing well. As my hon. Friends know, last month I embarked on a major, national consultation exercise to assist me in deciding, in the context of noise measurement, whether we should change from the NNI—the noise and number index—to LEQ as an index of aircraft noise at the designated airports. I am approaching this review with a completely open mind; my main concern, like I am sure that of my hon. Friends, is that we choose the right index and that we use the index which is most suitable and which commands public confidence. I have allowed six months for the consultation phase of the exercise and I look forward to considering all views before reaching any decisions.

Our noise index exercise is firmly based on research. The same is true of our other measures — night restrictions, for example. The last review, in 1981, of our night restrictions policy was based on the conclusions of a three-year study into the relationship between aircraft noise and sleep disturbance. A further study to validate or to assess changes since the original study has recently been completed and consultation with interested parties will of course play an important determinant of what we decide.

I am also engaged in a thorough review of the monitoring of noise and track keeping, in which both of my hon. Friends have taken a great interest. I want to be sure that the machinery for doing this is adequate and that we are able to retrieve the information in a form which enables us to ensure compliance by airlines with whatever rules we lay down.

Another important aspect of our approach to the problem of aircraft noise is the role of, and the scope for, consultation. I firmly believe that full consultation and public debate are essential components in the development of the right noise abatement measures — those which strike the right balance between conflicting interests. Poor consultation leads to hostility and confrontation. I can assure my hon. Friends that the present arrangement for consultation will remain unaltered by the privatisation of the BAA airports.

I turn now to the concerns expressed by my hon. Friends about the Heathrow-Gatwick helicopter link, which is known as the Airlink. Some measure of the different views upon this has been demonstrated by the interventions of my hon. Friends the Members for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel), Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) and Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth). In accordance with a direction given in 1984 by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and reaffirmed by a further direction last November, the present Airlink service terminated on 7 February. This was four months after the opening of the Wisley-Reigate stretch of the M25.

British Caledonian applied, in June 1985, to the Civil Aviation Authority to vary its licence so it could continue the Airlink service along new routes and at revised altitudes. My right hon. Friend directed the CAA that, if it decided to grant the application, the Airlink service should not fly along the new routes and altitudes until the matter had been referred to him and he had taken the final decision. The CAA announced on 4 February 1986 that it had granted British Caledonian's application and had referred the matter to the Secretary of State under section 17 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982.

My right hon. Friend and I have been considering the CAA's decision, together with all the evidence submitted to the hearing and the transcript of the proceedings——

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): The Minister will be aware that British Caledonian Helicopters is based in my constituency. In his considerations, I hope that he will take account of the fact that Airlink is crucial to the profitability of British Caledonian Helicopters and that a refusal to continue with it would put at risk 170 jobs that are based in Aberdeen.

Mr. Spicer: That intervention will be noted.

Mr. Greenway: It is absolutely typical of Liberals to pay no attention to the problems of local people. We shall remember that in Ealing, North and Ealing generally. We know now that Liberals want the helicopter link. There is considerable resentment in the area over which the helicopter link would operate that no inquiry has been allowed, and I have asked the Ombudsman to consider this.

Mr. Spicer: These brief interventions are further signs of the great disparity of views that exist on this issue. We have received many representations, including many from hon. Members on both sides of the House, and we are considering all of these extremely carefully. I shall note the comments that have been made during the debate.

Clearly, this is a very important and sensitive issue. My right hon. Friend and I are well aware of the strength of feeling that has been expressed, both by those in favour of the Airlink as well as those opposed to it. It is right that we should weigh all the arguments very carefully before coming to our decision. My right hon. Friend hopes to make an announcement on this matter within a few weeks. It would therefore be inappropriate for me to comment any further at this stage other than to say that I have listened carefully to what has been said on both sides of the argument.

I hope that I have said enough to indicate the Government's deep awareness of the problems that are created by aircraft noise. We shall always be receptive to positive and realistic suggestions of measures which can achieve a significant improvement, whether they are made by my hon. Friends or by others. I am grateful, personally, to my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham for raising this matter as it has given me an opportunity to respond fully on behalf of the Government.

Greater London Council

12.5 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): In just under three hours' time, I shall be taking the chair at county hall for the last full meeting of the Greater London council. At midnight on 31 March the GLC will cease to exist and 97 years of continuous Londonwide government will be at an end. It will be a historic moment in the often turbulent history of London local government. I seek to draw the attention of the House to the events that are due to take place across the water in the full and confident expectation that the abolition of the GLC will prove to be merely a temporary aberration.

I remind the House that it was the Prime Minister who insisted on the GLC being abolished. The right hon. Lady did so because, in my opinion, she is wholly ignorant of local government. She is brimful of prejudice and utterly vindictive. The Prime Minister's image of the GLC between 1981 and 1983 was that created by Fleet street. The image was bizarre, extreme and without foundation. However, it successfully inflamed the Prime Minister's already well developed sense of bigotry. With her eyes on what she thought was party political gain, she wrote into the Tory party manifesto the commitment to abolish the GLC. We have that on the very best authority within the Conservative party.

Naturally, the Government attempted subsequently to dress up the Prime Minister's diktat with spurious claims about taking local government closer to the people. The truth of the matter came, however, from the lips of the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and chairman of the Tory party. On 14 March 1984, the right hon. Gentleman said:

> "The Labour Party is the party of division. In its present form, it represents a threat to the democratic values and institutions on which our Parliamentary system is based. The GLC is typical of this new, modern, divisive version of socialism. It must be defeated. So we shall abolish the GLC."

Such a statement should send a shiver down the spines of those who believe in justice and democracy. It reveals that the Conservative party is now in the hands of louts and that Britain's Government is being run by people who have nothing but contempt for democracy.

The abolition of the GLC has nothing to do with efficiency in local government. Of the 2,000 or so submissions received by the Government in response to their original proposals that were outlined in the White Paper entitled "Streamlining the Cities", not one from an independent or authoritative source was in support of GLC abolition. So embarrassed were Ministers by the overwhelmingly hostile reaction to their proposals that they refused to give details of the submissions or to lodge them in the Library. Indeed, the House was denied a debate on the White Paper. It soon became clear that the Prime Minister and her colleagues were not going to allow facts to get in the way of their prejudices. Repeated requests from Members for some assessment of costs or savings arising from abolition were met with blank refusals after initial estimates, clearly plucked from the air by confused and panicky Ministers, were quickly proved to be absurd.

I should like to place on record how delighted I am that the Government's estimate of 5,000 redundancies in London arising out of the abolition of the GLC has been proved wrong. We now estimate that there will be a net increase in public sector jobs as a result of abolition, which merely demonstrates the efficient way that the GLC's current services are being staffed.

I have sat through hundreds of hours of debate in the House in various places on the abolition of the GLC, and, partial though I am—I am prepared to confess that—I can honestly say that I have never heard the Government win one of the arguments. Indeed, some of the worst maulings inflicted upon Ministers have come from senior Members on the Benches behind them.

Abolition of the GLC has undoubtedly done great damage to the electoral fortunes of the Conservative party in London, and naturally I welcome that. Indeed, the latest opinion polls published yesterday put Labour a clear 15 per cent. ahead of the Tories in London. However, far more importantly, abolition has done great damage to the image of Parliament. It has demonstrated that rational arguments, natural justice and public opinion are of no consequence whatever when faced by a brutal and arrogant Government with an overwhelming majority. As right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House have said on a number of occasions, abolition was a classic example of the elective dictatorship at work.

To have major changes in the structures of local government predicated on the political vindictiveness of the Prime Minister is bad enough, but then to have parliamentary sovereignty used to abolish an election and to destroy a whole area of local democracy is constitutionally outrageous.

The abolition of the GLC will leave London in a confused mess. Naturally, we shall muddle through—somehow we always do. But Parliament has been forced to expend enormous time and energy on a measure which is wholly irrelevant to the great problems facing the nation and our capital city. If only the Prime Minister hated London's unemployment and inner-city poverty as much as she hated county hall, perhaps London would not now be the city of despair that it has become to so many of our citizens.

After 31 March, London's local government will present a confused and haphazard pattern, botched together to try to make sense of abolition. Ministers said that abolition would streamline local government and remove unnecessary services, but an examination will quickly show that virtually all the council's present powers and services will remain. But instead of them being administered by one democratically elected and accountable body, they are being passed on to no fewer than 69 successor bodies—boroughs, joint boards, quangos and Government Departments.

I shall specify one quango, the London Residuary Body, truly the quango of all quangos, set up by a Government who once said that their policy was to abolish them. The LRB has a true-blue Tory as its chairman on a cool £50,000 a year salary. Appointed board members are paid the equivalent of £6,000 a year for one day's work a week—very nice work if you can get it. But, of course, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you cannot, unless you are a personal friend of a Secretary of State or a loyal supporter of the Tory party, and I accuse you of neither of those faults.

I remind hon. Members that Ken Livingstone, who was democratically elected, received the princely sum of £7,000 a year in allowances and expenses to run far more services than the LRB is receiving. However, in its recent budget the LRB announced a budget of something just short of two thirds of the GLC's budget. It is supposed to wind itself up in five years, but with all the additional tasks that it has now been given there is no chance of that happening. Indeed, litigation is still outstanding from the 1964 reorganisation of London's local government, so with 10,000 GLC properties to dispose of, what chance has the LRB got of tidying all that up in five years? However, that is an academic argument because, after the Labour party wins the next general election, the LRB will be sent packing.

While I am sending messages to the LRB, let me remind it that should county hall be sold as a hotel or supermarket—I unveiled our latest GLC blue plaque outside county hall only an hour or so ago—the next Labour Government will take it back for London. That is a firm commitment given by the shadow spokesman for the Environment.

London, of course, will survive the abolition of the GLC: we all know that. But many services will be less efficiently run, and many groups of people and organisations will be badly hit when the GLC goes. I shall highlight just a few.

The arts in London will suffer greatly, right the way through from the great centres to the smallest of the touring companies, because the GLC has been a magnificent funder of the arts. We estimate that the shortfall in arts funding in London will run to about £10 million next year. At the moment, the Law Lords are deliberating on further legal points about the GLC's forward funding. If we lose that case, the arts in London will lose another £4·6 million because that has been built into the forward package; and that does not include the black arts centre at the Roundhouse.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the tax concessions in the Budget for charitable bodies, including arts bodies, and the new proposal by which each person can deduct £100 a year from his salary and receive tax relief in order to benefit charities in the arts will give tremendous benefits to the arts, including those in the Greater London area?

Mr. Banks: Of course I know of the proposals. We had a debate not long ago on business sponsorship of the arts when we raised the matter of tax concessions. I welcome them. Who would not? Anyone who is interested in the arts would welcome them. But the hon. Gentleman is deceiving himself if he thinks that that will in any way substitute for the loss of funding that the arts in London and throughout the metropolitan area will suffer as a result of the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties. It will not do, but time will tell, and we can come back to that later.

The immediate areas in London which will suffer will be the ethnic and community arts where the GLC has funded art forms and groups that have long been ignored. Those are the areas for which it is most difficult to get business sponsorship and private donations.

With Easter weekend upon us, it is well worth remembering all the GLC-funded festivals in our parks—the Easter parade, Thamesday, South Bank weekend, the May Day festivals, the London horse show and children's days. All those now have question marks against their future. Parks that were being developed, such as Burgess and Mile End, can never now be completed without a Londonwide body. The future running of the Royal Festival hall gives me great concern, with 160 of our present staff there facing unemployment. The open foyer policy has been widely acclaimed, but how long will the Arts Council retain it in view of the fact that the South Bank board has already decided that it will change the GLC's South Bank literature centre—Bookspace—back into a restaurant? That does not seem like the South Bank board approaching in a serious way the problem of making the arts more accessible.

I shall be monitoring developments closely on the South Bank, and, again, I look forward to the return of the Royal Festival hall to a democratically elected council for London — a repossession already promised by the shadow spokesman for the arts.

Speaking, for a moment, as chairman of the GLC, I wish to record my personal satisfaction with the enormous progress made by the council in advancing the interests of London's women. The same is true in respect of our policies to combat racism and the discrimination still suffered by those Londoners with disabilities, by gays, lesbians and the elderly. It is right that the GLC should have funded groups concerned with the welfare of gays and lesbians, but so vile and reactionary are the majority of Fleet street journalists that the average Londoner could perhaps be forgiven for thinking that that was all that the GLC ever did.

The whole miserable saga may have concerned about 50 so-called controversial groups, but there were literally hundreds of other voluntary organisations over which there has never been any disagreement. The GLC's budget for the voluntary sector rose from £1 million in 1981 to £82 million in this, our final year. It is in this crucial area of caring and of social welfare for Londoners that the greatest damage could be done after abolition.

The Government's proposals for substitute funding are puny and wholly inadequate. Yet even at this stage the GLC is trying to stave off disaster in the voluntary sector. Today we have paid into court more than £30 million for funding the voluntary sector, should we win the case in the other place. If we lose, the money will go to the London Residuary Body for distribution to the London boroughs. Of course, the LRB will say that the abolition of the GLC is producing results and saving money. But the money currently being distributed to the boroughs comes from selling off assets and dismantling the balances accumulated. Once that money has gone, there will be no more, and then the real cost of abolition will become apparent.

The cost in terms of service efficiency will become apparent far more quickly than that. For example, in its waste disposal and recycling services, the GLC led the world in terms of efficiency and technology. The new proposals for London, whereby the GLC's unitary scheme is broken up into a series of groupings and authorities, has dumbfounded all those involved in waste disposal. The desirability of retaining a Londonwide waste disposal authority was self-evident, but so set were the Government against admitting the need for any strategic functions that they rejected it out of hand. What a bunch of petty and unimaginative little people now run this Government. The boroughs are already disagreeing among themselves over waste disposal, and the costs of waste disposal in London are set to soar through increased staffing and the loss of economies of scale. It is a pathetic shambles, and Ministers know it to be so.

I shall now deal with transport, because we can already see the impact of abolition as London Transport was taken away from the democratic control of the GLC and handed over to yet another quango in 1984. Since then, bus services have been reduced, fares have been dramatically increased, and many jobs have been lost. The GLC's dial-a-ride, taxicard and concessionary fares are superb facilities, the future of which cannot now be totally guaranteed as boroughs and the London Regional Transport increase charges or simply run down the services provided.

I have no doubt, for example, that the GLC's lorry ban will be terminated by the Secretary of State for Transport at the earliest opportunity. The fragmentation of bus lanes, cycle lanes and traffic schemes will effectively mean the end of most of those environmentally desirable innovations.

I have merely detailed a few of the areas where abolition of the GLC will have a marked effect on London. There are many more, such as planning, housing, industry, employment, scientific and technical services, and computer and information technology. Valuable services and expertise that have been built up over many years will be lost. All this is being done not because of any assessment of the needs of London and its citizens but because of petty party political spite on the part of the Prime Minister and her Government.

An opinion poll published yesterday shows that 81 per cent. of Londoners think that it is important to have a single body in the capital city for providing and co-ordinating services, and that no less than 94 per cent. of them believe that it is important for such a single body to be democratically elected. When I lower the GLC flag at county hall at midnight on 31 March, London will become the only capital city in Europe to be without a citywide government. Such a situation cannot continue for very long.

Apparently, even most Tories in London believe that a strategic authority for London will be re-established, and the Labour leadership has already committed itself to creating such an authority soon after the next general election. What we are about to witness is a mere break of service in London government for a year or so. For my part, I will continue to keep the name of the GLC before the House in every way open to me. I can assure the House that I have boundless energy and total commitment for such a campaign. Immediately after the Easter recess, I shall seek leave to introduce a Bill to establish a Londonwide authority, based on the conclusions of the GLC's research and consultation project. I have that document with me, and copies are being sent to all London Members of Parliament.

The GLC's abolition will haunt this Government through the coming Fulham by-election, the London borough council elections and right through to the general election. I still maintain that abolition will prove to be the single biggest error of political judgment on the part of this Government, and I for one will take every opportunity to help rub their faces in it. I will never forgive or forget those who, for reasons of spite or political preferment, have caused so much misery to loyal GLC employees and have created so much confusion and uncertainty for London's local government. But time will allow us to settle all these scores, and revenge will be very sweet indeed.

12.25 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey) rose——

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Minister responsible for sport to reply to this debate when the Secretary of State for the Environment clearly has responsibility for this monstrous act of abolition of the GLC?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): That is not a matter for me.

Mr. Tracey: I am glad to hear that after more than 200 hours of debate on the subject of the GLC's abolition, and with the benefit of answers from my colleagues to innumerable parliamentary questions, the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), the chairman of the GLC, has at last changed his tune. A year ago, he and his colleagues claimed that abolition simply could not be put into effect by 1 April 1986. In the Standing Committee debate on 18 December 1984, he even went so far as to say:

"Our point is that it is impossible to achieve such an objective by that date".—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 18 December 1984; c. 13.]

With a mere 100 hours to go, I think that I can safely predict that the hon. Gentleman will be proved conclusively wrong.

Of course, total conversion would be too much to hope for. Although the hon. Gentleman no longer claims that abolition cannot be achieved, he is still prophesying chaos and disaster, as is his custom. He simply cannot believe that the excellent London borough councils are capable of taking on their new responsibilities without the GLC to tell them where they are going wrong. Let me remind the House that those authorities — the London borough councils and the Common Council — are already the major providers of services in London. As we said in the White Paper entitled "Streamlining the Cities", the case for change rests on the fact that "in the metropolitan areas, the boroughs and district councils are the primary local government units. They are responsible for the majority of local spending. They are big enough to have full responsibility for most local services; at the same time they meet the need for an authority to be accessible to the local community".

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Tracey: These facts have not changed. Despite all the GLC's expensive publicity—and my goodness it has been expensive—the GLC has had full responsibility for only a very limited range of services. Indeed, the only change since the White Paper has been the establishment of London Regional Transport, which has further reduced the GLC's areas of responsibility. Of course, that has not stopped it spending ratepayers' money, searching for a role, or continuing the conflict and uncertainty which abolition is designed to eliminate by removing this unnecessary tier of local government.

It is not only the conflict and uncertainty to which we can now wave goodbye. We expect the removal of the unnecessary tier both to improve the structure of local government and to lead to savings in manpower and expenditure. The size of the savings will, of course, depend on the decisions of the successors to the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. Eighteen months ago we estimated that administrative savings could, after transitional costs, amount to £100 million a year or some 7,000 posts in London and the metropolitan county councils together. Indeed, there are already signs that they could be of the right order. The allowances for redundancy payments which the residuary bodies are making in their budgets total close to 7,000, and I understand that NALGO has a similar estimate.

Yesterday, The London Standard blazoned the headline "Job cuts fiasco", but that was belied by the article beneath it. Depending on which bit of it one wants to believe, there will be 2,300 redundancies in London, or 2,775.

It is of course important not to confuse initial redundancy figures with posts saved. Staff have been leaving the GLC and metropolitan county councils for jobs elsewhere, and some jobs in the residuary bodies will disappear later in the year. Further, we always expected that the numbers made compulsorily redundant would be much smaller. I am glad to say that this seems likely to be the case. But savings in actual posts of £100 million annually recurring is not exactly chicken feed, even by Labour county hall standards.

Moreover, ratepayers are already seeing the benefit of the changes to come. In London there are widespread and significant reductions in rates and a number of borough councils have acknowledged that the abolition of the GLC is one of the factors that has made the reductions possible.

It would of course, be surprising if the hon. Member for Newham, North-West, in his partisan way, had anything good to say about the prospect of reduced burdens falling on both commercial and domestic ratepayers. He does not believe that the borough councils can be more efficient than the GLC. I must, however, emphasise that the figures that I have quoted are for administrative savings alone. We have always said that policy savings resulting from decisions taken by authorities closer to the communities that they serve will be in addition to the savings from rationalisation alone, even though it is still too soon to estimate what these will be.

We have also made it clear that references to policy savings should not be taken to imply wholesale cuts in services. There has been scaremongering talk, for example, of reductions in the fire brigade. But my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has made it absolutely clear that no fire stations can be closed or fire appliances withdrawn without his express approval. He simply would not give that consent if it meant that the level of fire cover would fall below the nationally recommended standard.

There is absolutely no reason why the transfer of functions should mean any decline in service standards, nor need it lead to the abandonment of useful London-wide facilities. The London boroughs have, for example, carefully considered the future of a number of these and have decided to set up a scheme for Londonwide research and intelligence under section 88 of the 1985 Act. They have also decided arrangements to continue the work of the scientific branch, to set up a voluntary scheme for concessionary fares and to continue the taxicard scheme.

Hardly surprisingly, the majority did not see a need to continue the GLC's women's equality unit in its present form or the GLC's police committee support unit—an iniquitous organisation—but then the GLC has never had any responsibility for the police and we always expected the successor authorities to look critically at the services which they inherit to ensure efficiency and economy in the interest of all Londoners. They have shown that they are perfectly capable of taking decisions in the interests of London as a whole.

In addition to the facilities that I have already mentioned, the boroughs' co-ordinating committee has agreed to set up a scheme under section 48 for collective grants to voluntary bodies serving wider areas. This scheme, based on Richmond, has a budget of £27 million for 1986-87.

Throughout the debates on abolition, much play has been made of its consequences for the voluntary sector in London in particular. We said from the outset that it was not our intention to damage worthwhile voluntary projects through abolition; and we have provided a package of measures to support that intention.

Apart from providing in the Act for the section 48 scheme, for collective funding, we have ensured through the rate support grant settlement that the boroughs have access to all the resources that would have been available to the GLC and have been able to take account of the geographical distribution of £35 million of GLC grants to local voluntary bodies. We have also added to the successors' resources. We have offered transitional grant of £40 million over four years on projects previously supported by the GLC and MCCs. The amount of grant allocated to the boroughs for 1986-87 is over £12 million. I therefore believe that the Government have honourably fulfilled the assurances which we gave the voluntary sector during the abolition debate.

I do not, of course, claim that there are not some voluntary bodies still uncertain about their future — although the boroughs' decision to provide temporary funding through the Richmond scheme will have provided a welcome relief to many. Nor am I claiming that all GLC-funded groups will receive the same or even any support from the successor authorities. But that is a decision for them. While we have given the successors the resources the GLC and MCCs would have had—and more—we are not in the business of dictating their priorities, nor indeed the speed at which they reach their decisions.

As we said from the outset, abolition is all about local decisions being arrived at locally and democratically and I think that the London boroughs have shown through their Richmond scheme that they are well able to rise to the challenge. Despite the hon. Member's predictions of chaos and widespread disaster, I think that the worries about successor authorities failing to provide substantial funding can now be discarded and that once the dust has settled we will see the voluntary sector continuing to flourish.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the arts. I can predict a much less gloomy future than has been claimed. Once again, we have stuck to our undertaking to provide the resources that the GLC and MCCs would have had, and we have gone further in providing £43 million in additional central funding, including £25 million to the Arts Council for the performing arts. Here, too, the successor authorities are showing that they are well up to the task. Westminster city council has, for example, offered grants approaching £3 million, including £2·2 million to the English National Opera and the London Festival Ballet, while the Arts Council has established the South Bank board to run the whole arts complex. I am fully confident that the South Bank will flourish under its management.

Opposition Members may claim that the new South Bank board is only one of a whole host of new bodies that we have had to establish to take on the GLC's responsibilities, but even that claim does not stand up to close examination. The Arts Council is hardly a new organisation, nor is the Thames water authority which will be taking over land drainage and flood protection which are already water authority functions outside London. The Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission and the Royal Commission on Historical Monuments, which will also be taking on new responsibilities, were not born out of the Local Government Act 1985. What we have are the new ILEA, the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority and the London waste regulation and disposal authorities —hardly a host, even counting the London residuary body, which is of course a purely temporary organisation needed to wind up the affairs of the GLC.

I do not say that winding up the GLC and the MCCs will be easy. It will be more difficult perhaps than it should have been because of the obstructive behaviour which persisted far too long and was encouraged by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West. I am sure that he will be devoting his considerable energies to publicising any and every little thing that he believes does not go smoothly. But the problems will be transitional and will be resolved. What remains will be a streamlined structure with the borough councils taking their proper place in London's local government. They will show that they do not need the GLC, and their ratepayers will reap the benefits.

In a very short time people will be asking what all the fuss was about. Indeed, even now, after all their initial fervour, all that the Opposition can manage in the final week of Parliament is a half-hour Adjournment debate initiated by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West. That just shows that the GLC is going out, not with a bang, but with a whine and a whinge and a contribution from the most political chairman of the GLC that we have ever seen.

Warrington (Refuse Tip)

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): I am grateful for the opportunity of this Adjournment debate. I must correct an error which is entirely my fault. The request for the Adjournment debate refers to the decision not to call in the planning application for a refuse tip on land at Moore in Cheshire. I am reminded that although for some reason all the parties, including the borough council, refer to the land at Moore, the land is not at Moore but at Arpley meadows, the whole of which is in the Warrington district. No part of it is in the parish of Moore.

I realise that it may be said that I am trying to bolt the stable door after the horse has fled. On Monday 17 March the Secretary of State took the decision not to call in the application by the Manchester Ship Canal Company to have a waste disposal tip on the land at Arpley meadow but to leave the decision to the county council.

Within hours of the Secretary of State making that decision the Cheshire county council planning committee, ironically with one of the Labour councillors for Warringon in the chair, approved the plan for such a tip with indecent haste. Therefore, the decision for Cheshire had been taken. I understand from the borough council that it is considering the possibility of a judicial review of the decision taken by Cheshire county council, presumably based on the speed with which the decision was taken. That speed did not enable the council to consider objections to the scheme and I understand that Warrington borough council was not given the opportunity to comment on the amended plan which was approved on 18 March.

I protest over the fact that the Ministry did not call in the planning application. There is one simple question. Why was the planning application not called in by the Ministry? Of course I accept that we must have waste disposal tips somewhere. However, if we were more efficient in the recycling of waste we would save a great deal of natural resources and have less need for large tips. In this day and age alternative methods of waste disposal should be considered when any form of public inquiry is held.

However, we must have some form of tips. I recognise that the county council is under a statutory duty to provide for waste disposal. I also recognise that, wherever a tip is located, it is likely to be unpopular and there are likely to be objections. I accept that, if an application is called in after a public inquiry, it may well be that, at the end of the day, the same decision will be taken. My objection is that by leaving that decision to Cheshire county council the objectors' case has not been heard.

It cannot be said that this was not a controversial application. It was opposed by many local people and it was opposed by all the parish councils in my constituency —Penketh, Lymm and Moore. The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) and myself are also aware that it was opposed by Warrington borough council. All these parties asked the Minister to call the application in for consideration.

This is not a minor matter. The plan has been considerably modified. The original proposal was that the tip should be used for 40 years, but that has been modified to 25 years. That is still a generation—a generation for many people of lorries going in and out of the site. The site is roughly 400 acres. The height of the tip above ground level has been modified but it is still believed that it will reach 130 ft above the ground. The site will have 550,000 tons of rubbish dumped there every year. It is clear that it will be the major tip for Cheshire and it will also provide space for the waste from Merseyside.

This is not a normal type of planning application. Although it is true that the owner of the land is the Manchester Ship Canal and although it is true that the company made the application, the interested party in granting that application is the county council which is proposing to use the tip. It seems inevitable that it was bound to grant an application, if given the opportunity to decide it, because it is the party interested in achieving that result.

The speed with which the decision was taken certainly tends to confirm the fact that the decision had been prejudged. I repeat that, as far as I am aware, neither the district council nor the parish councils were officially asked to comment on the modified proposals. The failure of the Minister to call the application in has meant that the objectors have not been heard. The impression that is given is that Cheshire county council has been the judge and jury. I remind the Minister of the old adage that justice must not only be done but be seen to be done.

Why was the application not called in? I have no doubt that the Minister will say that the Secretary of State was sympathetic to the proposal but that it did not meet the criteria which are used for decisions of this kind. I realise there is great pressure on the Ministry to call in many inquiries and that it cannot call them all in. I realise that one must have some criteria and that one must use power to call in sparingly. What are the criteria that are used? Are they statutory or discretionary? If they are discretionary, why was discretion not exercised on this occasion? If the Secretary of State felt he could not call the application in because it did not meet the criteria surely the criteria are wrong and should be changed.

I am aware that any planning inquiry is time-consuming and expensive. It has one great advantage—it allows people to be heard. I have no doubt that the parish councils, together with the development corporation, the borough council and those concerned with conservation, were anxious to be heard on this occasion. One does not know what the outcome or modifications would have been had there been such an inquiry.

Where there is a major application of a nature that will affect the lives of many people for many years, and where the planning authority is the applicant, the Ministry should call the application in. If the criteria do not allow the Ministry to do that, I submit that the criteria ought to be changed.

I protest that this decision has been made. It is a mistaken decision and it is unfair to those involved. In my area it has been described as dictatorial and undemocratic. I have promised the hon. Member for Warrington, North that I would give him an opportunity to contribute to this debate so I shall make one final point.

It is said that the land has ecological importance and that much of the wildlife habitat would be destroyed by the tip. The traffic on all the routes will be enormous but I have no doubt that the county will do their best to meet that increase in traffic. It will require a new bridge to be built over the Mersey. Will the building of that bridge require further permission or, if it is on private land, will the county council be able to build it? I understand that the outer Warrington local plan had recommended that the area should be protected for recreational use. There was the possibility of a county park. The hon. Member for Warrington, North and myself are aware that there is not much spare land in that part of Cheshire. I am concerned, not so much with the merits of the case, but the failure to give those who wish to object the opportunity to advance their objections. I bitterly regret the Department's decision not to call in the application.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. We got off to a late start this morning, but we have made good progress in catching up with the printed schedule. I should be grateful if hon. Members would help me get back on course at about 1 o'clock.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: I spoke for just 11 minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful.

12.51 pm

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I shall try to assist you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in getting back to our schedule.

I thank the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) for giving me this brief opportunity to support his objections. The matter affects not just his constituency but mine. Much traffic would be caused by 314 loads a day going through a heavily populated part of my constituency on Liverpool road to the new bridge that will be built at Forest Way, which the right hon. and learned Gentleman described.

The land has ecological, recreational and educational value. There should have been a public inquiry. Despite the modification from 40 years, 25 years is still a long time. It is still a high tip in low-lying land. It will be seen for a long way, certainly from the heavily populated area in my constituency of Warrington, North, and from the main railway line that runs from London to Scotland. These days the impression that people get as they pass through an area is important. Warrington is a delightful area, with many places of scenic beauty, but if there is such an eyesore that can be seen from the railway line, people might decide not to bring their industry and so on to Warrington. Therefore, the proposal is a mistake.

I do not understand why the Secretary of State did not use his discretion under section 35 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 and the articles of the General Development Order 1977. Under those provisions, he could have called for a public inquiry. The reason is that Cheshire county council has an interest—it will manage the waste disposal tip, which will be very large. The council will profit from it as the waste will come not only from the Warrington and Cheshire area but from Merseyside. As other tips come to the end of their lives, the amount of waste will be added to. As the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South said, that is a wasteful way of going about it. Other methods could have been used. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was right to say that Cheshire county council is judge and jury. It acted speedily, within 24 hours, so that no one had a chance to make an objection.

All the parties on Warrington borough council were unanimous in their opposition to the proposal. Environmentalists and anglers object. I have much correspondence from my constituents and others objecting to it. I cannot understand why the Secretary of State took that action. Many people think that it was a spineless, diabolical thing to do to inflict that on the people of Warrington. My constituents and people in the surrounding area are dismayed, disappointed and disgusted at the action of not only the Secretary of State but Cheshire county council. I want to convey their views and dismay in the strongest terms.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) has raised an interesting and important matter. Quite rightly, he has been supported by the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) from the Labour Benches. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I know that the matter about which they are concerned is controversial. Indeed, proposals for development often are. That is one reason why in this country we have a planning system of which we are justly proud, which allows the majority of planning decisions on development proposals to be made by locally elected representatives. They are generally in the best position to understand the needs of their area and to have regard to the views of their electorate. I do not need to remind you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that often in debates in the House there is much talk about over-centralisation.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South has taken a close interest in the proposal by Manchester Ship Canal Company to tip domestic and industrial waste on 390 acres of land between the ship canal and the river Mersey at Moore, near Warrington. I appreciate his concern. Tips are, by their nature, particularly controversial. I know that my right hon. and learned Friend has lent his support to those of his constituents who approached him to express their opposition to the scheme.

I fully understand that local people are concerned about the impact of the proposal. Lymm parish council and Great Sankey parish council wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expressing concern and drawing attention to the strong objection of local bodies. He received from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South the representations of the Warrington New Town Nature Conservation Group. It expressed concern about the loss of areas of county ecological significance and the loss of an area used for informal recreation. The representations from Warrington borough council were brought to my right hon. Friend's attention by the hon. Member for Warrington, North. The borough was concerned, too, about the involvement of Cheshire county council as planning authority and waste disposal authority.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was aware of the other objections from local bodies and local residents. Some of the local interests that originally expressed concern about the proposal did not object, and I understand that some withdrew their objections. That resulted at least in part from amendments to the proposal, which were negotiated by Cheshire county council with the ship canal company. They clearly went some way to meeting some of the objections of local people.

Let me rehearse briefly the details as I understand them. The site is intended to replace an existing disposal area at Gateworth farm on the opposite bank of the River Mersey. Capacity there will be exhausted in 1988. The new site is mainly dredging deposit ground, now disused. Cheshire county council, is to lease and manage the tip and will be the major user of the tip. The life of the tip was originally proposed to be 40 years, but in negotiation with Cheshire county council, as my right hon. and learned Friend said, the ship canal company reduced that to 25 years. Other amendments included reducing the visual impact of the tip by lowering its height by 14 m and by proposing shallower gradients. When complete, the southern section of the tip is to return to agriculture and the northern area to forestry.

I understand that a large measure of agreement has been reached with the Cheshire Conservation Trust. The trust is to lease and manage 180 acres of land adjoining the proposed waste disposal site as a nature reserve.

In its revised application, the ship canal company proposed to open up a footpath along the southern bank of the River Mersey and to provide an increased area devoted to forestry and landscaping. So, in the longer term, a substantial area of former waste land will become widely available for informal outdoor recreation. Wearing another of my hats, I welcome that.

But to pass on to the proposition that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had before him, it was not a question of the merits of the proposal—the issue was whether it was appropriate to take the decision out of the hands of Cheshire county council. My right hon. and learned Friend asked about that. The Secretary of State considered the proposal against his general policy, which is to continue to be very selective about calling in cases for his own decision. There is a long-standing policy that applications will in general be called in only if planning issues of wider than local importance are involved.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, after very careful consideration of all the representations that he received, decided that the application should be left to the county council to determine. He appreciated the strength of the views raised in opposition to the proposal and acknowledged their importance, but he concluded that they were of local rather than regional or national significance, and he was not persuaded that it was a matter that the county council did not have the competence to determine.

I am informed that the application was approved by the county council on 18 March. That is subject to negotiation of an agreement, under section 52 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, with the canal company for the 180 acres of woodland and wet grassland immediately to the south of the application site to be leased and managed by the Cheshire Conservation Trust.

I must emphasise that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State considered whether he should take the decision out of the hands of the county council. He was not taking a view on the merits of the proposal. But I would like, nonetheless, to invite the House to look beyond this particular case and consider the need for a positive approach to the whole Mersey basin. Right hon. and hon. Members will have heard of the Mersey basin campaign—a major Government initiative to clean the undoubtedly badly polluted water courses of the Mersey system and to promote matching improvements in the use of the land alongside. The basin covers 1,000 square miles. It takes in river and watercourses from the Pennine foothills to the mouth of the Mersey. The aim is to bring together public, private and voluntary sectors to attack the twin problems of water pollution and riverside dereliction. I hope that the energy and skill of local people and groups will be directed in a positive way to using every asset to bring this about.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's top priority is care for the environment. I do not think that anyone can doubt that from the statements he has made. The Mersey basin campaign is a prime example of that commitment. Ultimately, if everybody with an interest in the area pulls together, the result will make a contribution to the economy of the area and to creating an attractive environment and recreational facilities for the good people of the north-west.

Liverpool

1.1 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): In following the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) I am glad to say that I shall be saying a word or two at the end of my remarks about the problems of the River Mersey and one way of perhaps tackling unemployment in our area. I suggest that the construction of the Mersey barrage would help to assist jobless people in Merseyside and also be part of a campaign to clean up the Mersey and turn it into a resource for the people of our conurbation.

I want to use the opportunity of today's Adjournment debate to focus the attention of the House on the effect of the Goverment's economic policies, specifically on the city of Liverpool. Obviously, I shall talk about what the city can do for itself, but my primary purpose is to paint a picture for the House, and I intend to divide my remarks into four parts.

First, I shall outline the general effects of the Government's economic policy and will contend that it totally fails to address itself to the deep-seated problems of cities such as mine. Secondly, I shall fill in the detail on the canvas, placing before the House figures which demonstrate how Government policies have specifically affected Liverpool. Thirdly, I want to say something about the immediate implications of the policies. Finally, I want to put some proposals to the Minister, and I hope that she will be able to respond to them.

I shall begin with the broad thrust of the Government's economic policy. Within the past couple of weeks the House has had a chance to consider the Government's White Paper on public expenditure and the Budget. The 500,000 citizens of Liverpool awaited the Chancellor's Budget statement with great expectations. As the pundits raked over the entrails during the run-up to the Budget announcement, many commentators predicted that extra resources would be made available to fight poverty or to combat mass unemployment. The commentators, like the citizens of Liverpool, were badly disappointed. Liverpool people waited in vain as the Chancellor's statement meandered on to hear what he intended to do about unemployment. It was on that criterion alone that the Budget was to be judged in the north of England.

The absence of any proposal of substance led many of us to the conclusion that the Government, and perhaps particularly the Prime Minister, do not care. The right hon. Lady does not seem to care about Liverpool or about the unemployed generally. It is not that the people of Liverpool or I blame her for every person who has become unemployed, although one person has become unemployed every minute of every day since the Government were elected in 1979. It is not even that we blame her for everything that is wrong in Liverpool or Britain. However, people do blame her for not caring. Liverpool seems to be treated like some sort of distant outpost of the empire—out of sight, out of mind. If the Prime Minister occasionally came to see for herself the heartbreak which her policies have created, I do not believe that it would leave even the hardest-hearted person unmoved.

Last week the Prime Minister and the Chancellor had certain choices. They could either do something about unemployment, or cut taxes, in this case by 1p in the pound. She chose to cut taxes, and we are confidently told that the £1 billion give-away is the prelude to a further bonanza of between £4 billion and £5 billion next year, reducing the standard rate to 25p in the pound.

In examining the choice that the Prime Minister made, it is evident once again that unemployment has been given a low priority. She could have used that £1 billion to create thousands of construction jobs or to cut by 10 per cent. the national insurance contribution that employers pay. Either way, it would have created jobs. If the Prime Minister cares, she could have used that £1 billion to improve on the 40p increase coming to pensioners in July, or to help pay their fuel bills after the shivering cold winter. She could have used that £1 billion to fight poverty and create a fairer Britain. Instead, she gave it all away, just like she has frittered away the £30 billion oil revenue that has come into our country's coffers over the past six years. That is money which should have been used to invest in Britain's future.

Our economy under the Government has been run rather like a giant jumble sale, where everything must go. National assets, resources and companies such as Westland, Land Rover and British Leyland—some £7 billion of national assets—have been flogged off at knock-down prices in the past five years. Another £14 billion worth is earmarked for similar treatment between now and 1989.

Notwithstanding the morality of such policies, perhaps my complaint about the economic thrust would be lessened if I could see any evidence that this country's considerable resources were being reinvested to create a happier and more prosperous Britain. However, popular capitalism, as it has come to be known, which presumably implies that everybody should have a stake, is simply not available or relevant to the unemployed, the poor, the powerless or the alienated in our inner cities. Deliberately encouraging people to care for number one and abandon their concern for others deepens the divisions in Britain.

Another aspect of the Government's general economic approach as it affects Liverpool deeply troubles me. It concerns the social and economic cost of leaving so many people without work. In the United Kingdom, in 1986, it is estimated that it will cost some £23 billion to keep 3·4 million people out of work. The bill comes to £2·5 billion on Merseyside alone. Apart from the personal trauma which being unemployed causes anyone who loses his job, the waste of resources is self-evident. This year, we will spend as a nation three times more on social security than on education, ten times more than on law and order and transport, three times more than on health, and seven times more than on housing or creating jobs. That is popular capitalism in action.

The social consequences of unemployment are also enormous. To realise that one has only to look at the crime rate in areas of mass unemployment. In Liverpool, one crime takes place very three minutes and half the crimes are committed by unemployed young people. Thousands of young people have filled their empty lives with the quick fix of the heroin pusher, others have committed suicide, and yet others have been made easy cannon fodder for Derek Hatton's Militants. It is in that context that the Government's economic policies must be judged. It is a picture which serves to underline the sheer irrelevance of tax cuts when so many other priorities were waiting to be tackled.

Turning from the general picture, I said that I would paint some detail on to the canvas. Nine hundred years ago, William the Conqueror commissioned the Domesday Book as a survey of the state of the nation. It revealed a divided nation. The survey was taken in the aftermath of William's campaign to break the spirit of the dissidents and rebels of the north. After that, he was also to be known as the harrier of the north. The Domesday Book reveals an economy that was ruthlessly destroyed in order to create fear and subservience among the citizens.

There are clearly some parallels which could be drawn with today. Unemployment in the north has been used as a way of keeping the people down, of creating a climate of fear. Jobs have been destroyed, often quite needlessly, all in the name of political dogma, and, to some extent, because of the Prime Minister's personal vanity. It is now six years since the Prime Minister said that she hoped that unemployment would not hit 2·5 million. It was in the same year that she correctly observed that poverty, wherever, it exists, is the enemy of stability. Today 3·4 million people are jobless. In cities like Liverpool political stability has been ruptured, partly thanks to the abdication by the Government of their responsibility for the welfare of their citizens.

Today, there are a phenomenal 107,891 Liverpool people on the dole—one in five—comprising 78,321 men and 29,570 women. We should look a little more closely at the profile of those who are unemployed. Among young people, the prospects of getting a job are negligible. A staggering 42,000 under the age of 24 are without work, and there is a youth unemployment rate of 39 per cent.

People are also being consigned to the dole for much longer periods—almost indefinite periods in some cases. Whereas, in 1979, 37 per cent. of unemployment was for more than a year's duration, by 1985 that figure had risen to 53 per cent. The continuing massive level of unemployment and the length of unemployment inevitably have cumulative effects on personal incomes and social conditions in the city generally. The loss of jobs, more part-time work and a growing proportion of female employment is leading to a relative decline in income levels. By way of example, in 1981, 28 per cent. of children in the city received free school meals. By last year, the proportion was over 50 per cent.

Compounding Liverpool's unemployment problem has been the huge loss of population. This should serve as a warning to those who prescribe the purchase of bicycle clips as a way of solving unemployment. People have been leaving Liverpool hand over fist, and look where it has left us. Liverpool has lost a third of its population in the last 25 years. Between 1966 and 1971 we lost people at the rate of 22,000 a year. Between 1971 and 1981 they left at the rate of 8,740 a year. Over the last five years they have left at the rate of 6,500 a year. This has bled the city of ratepayers, self-starters and entrepreneurs.

There are also proportionately more people in vulnerable groups. The growth in pensioner households, the over-80s—the fastest growing group in the city—single parents, the unemployed and the permanently sick place impossible demands on the local authority's reduced resources and on its services. The sombre and chilling reality for Liverpool is that, if job losses do not slow down, migration will again increase as the more mobile seek job opportunities elsewhere. This will simply further compound Liverpool's problems and turn it into a ghost town.

It is to this change in Liverpool's demography that the Government must address themselves. Liverpool, 1986, is not Liverpool, 1971. In 1971, 42·1 per cent. of the total population were employed and 4·5 per cent. were unemployed. By 1985 that had changed to 34 per cent. being employed, with 12·7 per cent. of the total population being unemployed. This meant that 20 per cent. of the total employable work force were out of work.

Other things have changed, too. During the same period the number of children has fallen by a third. In 1971 they comprised a quarter of the population. In 1985 they comprised only a fifth. During the same period the number of retired people rose from 13·6 to 17·8 per cent. It is in this context of desperate need and changed circumstances that the Government's economic policies must be judged. It is in this context of a dole queue which has doubled between 1971 and 1981 that the House must judge the relevance or sense of the Government's present economic policies.

I said that I would turn to a third area. This concerns the immediate implications of Government policies in Liverpool. Since 1979, the Government have cut some £285 million of rate support grant. In addition, we have lost £30 million from higher education, £98 million in housing subsidies and £150 million from the housing programme. During the last two years the city council has destroyed a perfectly good case in pleading for a reversal of this disastrous national policy by hurtling the city and its citizens towards chaos at each and every opportunity. Derek Hatton has played right into the Prime Minister's hands.

The latest damning indictment of Militant Labour's tactics was published only yesterday in a 47-page report by Mr. Tim McMahon, the district auditor. He says that he has never seen an administration act as irresponsibly as this one has done. The council has undoubtedly damaged Liverpool's reputation to the point where some constituents have told me that they are ashamed even to admit to outsiders that they come from a city of which its citizens have been traditionally proud.

At midnight on 2 April, if there is no appeal by the 48 Labour councillors who have been disqualified from public office because of the reckless way in which they have run the city, the city's affairs will be in the hands of sensible people: Liberals, sensible members of the Labour party and Conservatives. I hope that they will unite to give the city the leadership that it deserves, but they will need resources. There is an immediate deficit of £37 million to be faced.

I must warn the Government that there is no point in sending emissaries to Sir Trevor Jones, the leader of the Liberal group, telling him to make cuts by sacking the work force. During the years that we were in control, we never made a single person compulsorily redundant, and we do not intend to start now. Sacking people in Liverpool will simply lead to social disorder on a grand scale. What is needed is a sensitive and humanitarian response, or we will create the climate for Militant to whip up more bitterness, hatred and sectarian discord.

May I also plead with the Government that if the councillors decide to appeal, the Lord Chancellor has a duty to ensure that those appeals are heard as rapidly as possible, so that this long-running saga may be quickly brought to an end.

The final part of my remarks are concerned with positive proposals, which I hope the Minister will examine. First, after the disappearance of the Merseyside county council as an umbrella organisation, a number of useful initiatives could disappear. I hope that the Government will accept some responsibility for that. Particularly, I refer, as I did at the outset of my remarks, to the construction of the Mersey barrage. If a barrage were created across the Mersey, not only would it impound the Mersey and create massive recreational facilities, but it would create a third of the electricity requirements of the area and a new deep sea water facility for berthing ocean-going vessels in the mouth of the Mersey. It would also create a massive number of jobs in the construction industry. It would be a symbol of hope for the people of Liverpool.

Archbishop Warlock, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Liverpool, said at a civic service just two weeks ago:

> "Just at this time our city and much of the County lies wounded. But for the spirit of the people it might well be hard to maintain hope. If we are to counter what we believe to be a false image of our part of the country, we must not only pick ourselves up but as one body work together to renew the life and activity of a people who brought greatness to Merseyside. There are new opportunities, new challenges to be faced: new goals to be won . . . Perhaps the new much-discussed Mersey Barrage is the symbol we need. A renewed role for the old Mersey. New jobs. Improved environment. A new source of energy for ourselves and for many more throughout our land."

The barrage would also be a symbol of partnership between private and public enterprise. I hope it is one that the Government will back.

I hope that the Minister will also say a word or two about the possibility of moving the intervention board headquarters from Reading to Liverpool. I know that the Government are considering this proposition and that bids have been put in by Manchester Conservative Members of Parliament to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I have written to him on this question this week, and I hope that we will be given some news.

I hope also that when the franchise for Granada Television in the north of England is renewed, the Minister will consider splitting the franchise and creating a new television station based on Merseyside. That would help to create many jobs in the entertainment industry. Liverpool is famous for its comedians—although we never thought that we would see them running the city council—and for its musicians, actors, playwrights and poets. A new television station would help to improve Merseyside's image. Liverpool people as well as the Minister should address their minds to the point that, unless we improve the image of our conurbation, we cannot hope to bring new enterprise to the area.

With the disappearance of the county council there will be a need for a regional development agency, along the lines of the Scottish model, and for a tourist board. We should look at the ways in which we support the local free port, which has been very successful. Last year more than £17 million of work came through the free port. If changes in the operation of VAT were made in the free port, more business would be attracted.

Voluntary organisations, which create much work in Liverpool, are in extreme difficulty because of funding cuts. The local council has been intransigent in assuming the responsibilities previously held by the county councils. Although I am grateful to Lord Elton for the help that he has given and for meeting the groups that I have taken to see him, I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will say more about this matter.

In conclusion, I hope that, in the longer term, we will see a complete reversal of the Government's damaging economic policies. I very much hope that the Chancellor will take the opportunity in his autumn statement to redress some of the grievances that I have mentioned——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I hope the hon. Member appreciates that this debate should finish at 1.30 pm. If he wants the Under-Secretary of State to reply, he should conclude quickly.

Mr. Alton: I was on my last sentence, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I did say, "In conclusion." I hope that the Chancellor in his autumn statement will redress some of the grievances that I have mentioned and use some of the moneys in the unusually large Contingency Fund to tackle the nation's decaying infrastructure and especially the problems of Liverpool.

1.20 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): I shall respond as briefly as I can to the important subject raised by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton). In his opening remarks he attacked the Government for their economic policies. I was somewhat surprised to learn of his view and to see that he totally ignored the realities. There has been a clear recovery of our economy, with 3·5 per cent. more growth, providing the stability and security that will help to overcome many of the difficulties faced by northern cities such as Liverpool. I shall come to the hon. Gentleman's point about positive unemployment measures which the Government have taken in the Budget.

On the general points about the north, I should like to point out that local government as a whole, irrespective of its political control, can take up the advantages of Government initiatives—Newcastle, for example, has managed to take advantage of them—and provide the infrastructure for those cities, which have undoubtedly suffered with the disappearance of traditional businesses and industries, but which have now begun to regenerate themselves with great assistance from the Government. Liverpool, alas, did not take advantage of those Government initiatives, because of the curious leadership on the council. To a certain extent, therefore, it is Liverpool's fault that much of what could have been done to help the Liverpool people, for whom all of us have great sympathy, was ignored.

The hon. Member for Mossley Hill referred to a great deal of money which should have gone to Liverpool council and could have helped the city to make a better recovery. I must point out that the city could always have earned more money if there had been sensible planning and if it had used the efficient methods of running local government used by many councils. For example, in 1985-86, Liverpool city council had a budget of £265 million, which led to the city being rate capped. Under these proposals, the city was given a grant of only £30 million. Because the council had to bring its budget down to £222 million, it earned itself an extra £90 million. That happened simply because of the necessity to behave properly. That gave the city a total of £119 million of Government grant, which was much better than anything the councillors had originally proposed.

I understand that the district auditor's report has just been sent to the council. The hon. Member for Mossley Hill will appreciate that that is a matter between the district auditor and the councillors. We understand that it is a private report. We shall be extremely interested to see what it says and to note the council's response.

At the heart of the Government's policies relating directly to Liverpool is a recognition of the fact that for many years Liverpool's economy has been in decline. We have believed that to achieve a wider regeneration of the area priority must be given to creating a climate in which the private sector is encouraged to grow. That will enable the spirit of enterprise and innovation to flourish, in just the same way as I have mentioned that it has and can flourish in other cities in the north. The Government's policies have therefore been geared to provide the means for improving the quality of the local environment, living conditions, and working skills of people. In consequence, that should make the area more attractive to local entrepreneurs and private investors as a place to develop and expand their businesses, and I could give many examples where that has happened.

The hon. Member for Mossley Hill is aware that Liverpool, as a development area, receives the highest level of Government support when firms decide to move in or to expand their businesses in that area. It receives a high allocation of funds from the Manpower Services Commission's programmes which are aimed at youth training, the community programme and the enterprise allowance scheme. It is a partnership authority under the Inner Urban Areas Act 1978, receiving a high level of aid from the Department's urban programme. Within its area there is an urban development corporation geared to regenerating extensive areas of Liverpool dockland and the enterprise zone at Speke designated in 1981 to encourage new industrial and commercial development. As the hon. Gentleman rightly mentioned, there is a free port, which, I am glad to hear, he is happy to encourage in its operation. Much has been attempted to assist and underpin the decline in Liverpool.

A massive £24 million was committed through the urban programme alone. As the hon. Gentleman said, the city council chose, unwisely in the Government's view, not to direct this money towards economic and industrial regeneration. I do not want to dwell on the council's failures. I should like to say, however, that it is important to recognise that the Government have, through their urban programme, provided a unique opportunity for job creation and economic development. Unfortunately, so far, the council has refused to take up that opportunity.

Liverpool has benefited from the Government's policy of targeting derelict land grant towards sites with hard after-uses, particularly in industrial and commercial development. Some £8·5 million has been spent since 1983 to reclaim sites for industry and generally to improve the quality of the environment, and to encourage investors into the area. No doubt the hon. Gentleman knows that one of the most spectacular examples of that occurred within his constituency, at Wavertree.

The hon. Gentleman will know that in 1981 the Government established the Merseyside development corporation to regenerate no fewer than 865 acres of massively derelict and disused dockland at the heart of the area. It was recognised from the outset that substantial public funding would be required to achieve the corporation's objectives. All in all, capital expenditure so far in Liverpool has totalled £97 million.

I would remind the hon. Gentleman that the corporation successfully mounted the first ever international garden festival to be held in this country. It attracted about 3·3 million visitors, and its great success brought new confidence to the area. I hope that that will continue to operate successfully under the private sector development initiative.

The co-operation of Government Departments in the way that I have said has also produced other new developments. For example, nine information technology centres, four commercial business centres, and three small firms workshops have been set up in the wider Merseyside area, all designed to assist in the training of people, particularly in new technology.

Most recently, as the hon. Gentleman will know, the task force has been encouraging the establishment of job clubs, which are aimed specifically at helping the long-term unemployed to find work. About 11 such centres are to be established in Liverpool this year.

I should like to consider some of the problems that have been raised about unemployment. The hon. Gentleman will know that the Government place great emphasis on the need to raise the level of skills and provide training and retraining facilities for both youngsters and adults in Liverpool. In 1985-86, 12,000 places will have been filled on youth and adult training schemes. Places have been provided under the community programme and the voluntary project programme, and support for initiative and enterprise has been given by the enterprise alliance scheme. So far, over 300 people have taken advantage of that. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Budget proposals last week included further initiatives for training under the community programme, many of which I hope and trust will find support in the city of Liverpool.

All those policies for Liverpool, or indeed anywhere else, are not just about providing finance, but about stimulating ideas, organisation and co-operation for new initiatives. That is what the Merseyside task force has been doing. There are no easy answers. The hon. Gentleman referred to population losses. I believe that in many ways they show the deep-rooted failure of the city council to address itself to the assistance made available to it by the Government and to tackle sensibly and efficiently the underlying problems that Liverpool faces simply through the decline of industry.

Although there are no quick or easy answers, I have outlined some of the measures that the Government have taken and which I believe are now beginning to show signs of making an impact in restoring confidence. Any alternatives involving greater sums of money would be successful in the long term only if they worked in co-operation with the private sector. The London docklands experience has given much weight to the argument that Government investment in any great city such as Liverpool will benefit the people living there only if the private sector has the confidence to add much larger sums. Newcastle, again, is a good example of the help that such initiatives can provide.

I am afraid that the attitude of Liverpool city council has not been helpful in contributing to and supporting this effort. Unfortunately, its approach has been both narrow and municipal, it has largely ignored the possibilities of the private and voluntary sectors, and it has been very wasteful of resources. It would have done better to interest itself in developments such as housing co-operatives to ensure that money was spent greatly to the benefit of people living in Liverpool, rather than adopting what I regard as a rather narrow and intransigent approach.

The previous Liberal administration must also take some responsibility for perhaps failing to tackle the inefficient delivery of many basic council services, especially in housing. I hope that the new views which now prevail will assist in that respect.

I am glad that the city has now decided to act sensibly and to set a rate for 1986-87. It is well known that rates are an important factor in determining the location and success of businesses. Rate capping has prevented the worst excesses of profligate authorities, but there can be no place for inefficiency or poor management in the delivery of local authority services in an area fighting for its economic life. Like any other authority, Liverpool must now live within its means if it is to make significant progress towards recovery.

I cannot speculate on which party will take office in Liverpool or who will be leader of the city council after the local elections, but any new council will clearly have a hard task to put right the problems of the past and will face some of the same constraints as the present council. For instance, the rate limit for next year has already been debated and approved by the House. I can say, however, that if there is a change of leadership the Government will look forward to working with a council which has a real desire to make progress in partnership with the Government towards real improvements for the people of the city of Liverpool.

It is untrue to say that the Government do not care about the way in which the people of Liverpool have to live. I believe that much is due to the fact that the city council has brought only financial and economic harm to the city in past years. The Government will certainly find it easier to work with a council which is prepared to use all the available resources to promote the well-being of the city. We have urged that course on the present council, but, alas, to no avail.

Finally, I should like briefly to refer to the positive points that the hon. Gentleman made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must remind the Minister that we are now eating into the time allocated for the next debate and taking the time allocated to other hon. Members.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am very well aware of that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and will finish in less than a minute. I accept the hon. Gentleman's positive suggestions about specific areas in which the Government and a responsible city council could encourage the regeneration of the area.

Air Safety

1.35 pm

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): I declare an interest as deputy chairman of the all-party air safety group.

Nineteen eighty-five was the worst year ever for civil aviation fatalities throughout the world. A total of 1,984 people were killed in major airline accidents. That is a horrifying number, yet in percentage terms those fatalities represent considerably fewer than 1 per cent. of passengers carried by the world's airlines. That figure shows the underlying safety of flying. Bearing in mind the size and complexity of a modern airliner, those figures speak volumes for the reliability and efficiency of airliners. Yet, because of those accidents, one must admit that an unease has crept into the minds of many would-be air travellers. I believe that that unease is founded on the fact that so many of the deaths seem to result from circumstances well within existing technology and that have caused other fatal injuries over the years.

The argument runs thus: if those risks were known already, why had nothing been done to eliminate them? What is more, the defence that the risk was too slight to warrant the expenditure on the necessary safety precautions is not much comfort to the bereaved or to those who have lain in hospital as a result of such accidents. They may fairly argue that if an airline says that it takes good care of you it means what it says, as it does when it says that it puts people first, or talks of its efficiency. People may presume that when an airline boasts about its passenger seats it is implying that it combines strength with comfort and design—not that, too often, they are 10g seats in a 20g aircraft for a 40g man, or, in other words, that they are not stressed for the strains with which they may have to deal.

Last but by no means least, there is a general assumption that, as weaknesses or faults are discovered by airlines, these faults are notified to some central authority that, after consultation with the aircraft makers, issues advice to all operators of that aeroplane. Sadly, almost all those assumptions are mistaken. Certainly airlines care about carrying passengers. That is why they exist. However, whether they are as safety-conscious as they could be depends on one's expectations and on the amount that airline passengers are prepared to pay for increased safety.

In fact, airline advertisements never refer to safety. No matter from which country the company flies, the emphasis is on punctuality, good service, comfort, food and very often the good looks of the air hostesses. There is virtually never any emphasis on safety. It may be that airlines do not believe that safety is a sales feature. Perhaps they wish to give the impression that flying is so intrinsically safe that safety may be taken for granted. As I have said, flying is remarkably safe. It is 16 times safer today than it was in 1950. However, whereas in 1984 the odds on being killed in a civil air crash were one in 3·7 million, in 1985 those odds had shortened to one in 600,000 passengers carried.

More worrying still are the number of near misses reported, which must give cause for concern because of their possible consequences if they had become accidents.

It is not easy to pinpoint the reasons for increased accidents and fatalities because they have such a wide variety of causes and characteristics. We can only say that every nation operating an airline has a responsibility—as do the manufacturers, the engine makers and the component suppliers. They, in turn, must follow the rules laid down by the national and international safety authorities, of which the Federal Aviation Administration in America and our Civil Aviation Authority are among the better known. It is to those bodies and to the International Civil Aviation Organisation that we must turn to discover the regulations and how they are administered.

ICAO possesses the accident investigation group, which was described to me recently as having

"no money and no teeth."

It seeks to update safety regulations on an international basis, but it is often slow to act. When my hon. Friend the Minister replies perhaps he will tell me whether the ICAO air navigation commission has yet updated the regulations relating to co-ordination between civil and military authorities, and to interception, following the shooting down of the Korean Boeing 747 by Russian fighters over the Sea of Japan in 1983.

Until the time of that disaster there was no ICAO requirement for civil aircraft to have the VHF international distress frequency selected at all times. That means that, if a civil aircraft wanders off course and is intercepted, radio contact can be made by the interceptor aircraft.

The Korean 747 was off course for three hours, but, apparently, was unaware of the interception that had been made by the Russian aircraft until it was too late. Perhaps my hon. Friend will tell me that the position is now different and that the ICAO regulations have been updated. If so, I am unaware of it. The long intervals that appear to take place in the updating of international safety regulations gives me considerable cause for concern.

Nearer home, how does the CAA measure up as a watchdog for our air safety? The main criticism that I have heard of it is that it reacts after the event because it possesses neither a research centre nor the funds to carry out research into safety. It is certainly true that too often it follows the American FAA or US National Transportation Safety Board in what they do. While the FAA introduced its fire resistance standard for aircraft passenger seats in October 1984, for example, the CAA introduced its regulations in June 1985 and updated them in January 1986, admittedly to a higher standard.

One cannot help feeling that that updating took place because of the dreadful fire disaster at Manchester airport last August when 55 people died in a British Airways Boeing 737 while it was still on the ground. Having seen the burnt-out fuselage of that aircraft, I can only say that it is a miracle that anyone escaped alive, especially as the interior furnishings and lockers were completely destroyed by the fire, as were most of the seats. Passengers using the mid-fuselage emergency exit found that they had to clamber across three seats to reach those exits, or, if they were in the forward part of the cabin, to pass one at a time through a narrow space between the forward galleys, only to discover that one of the forward exit doors had jammed shut for precious seconds which might have saved lives.

When I saw the fuselage by courtesy of the air accident investigation branch, I was told that normally evacuation tests on aircraft require that only 50 per cent. of emergency exists needed to be open to prove that they were satisfactory. Needless to say, the front exit doors had not been included in that test.

I make those points, not to anticipate the findings of the inquest which is soon to be held on that crash or the inquiry which will be held later this year, but because those hazards could have been anticipated. The tragic effect of fire in an airliner cabin is well known, just as it is known that most passengers die from the hydrogen cyanide and carbon monoxide fumes given off by burning polyurethane seats. But it is only now that we are demanding fire blocking materials. By the same token, evacuation procedures using a mix of exits could have been introduced so that all the exits are tested on British civil airlines. And what about the galleys on the 737? They should have been recognised for what they are, a barrier to evacuation.

All this is hindsight, but so too are the CAA regulations of January 1986 which now contain instructions on how to improve certain mid-cabin emergency exits and on how to provide floor level emergency escape path lighting. They also contain a number of other improvements, but what else should we be looking at? What about the blocked off over-wing exits on the 747? What about the large bits that regularly fall off aircraft in Berkshire after aircraft have taken off from London airport? No airline ever seems to claim those bits. What about the strength of passenger seats, the benefits of shoulder and lap straps rather than seat belts, and overhead lockers that are less flammable and have burst-proof locks to spare passengers a torrent of heavy objects falling on their heads in an accident? The list is long.

In 1982 the magazine Flight, under the heading "1,850 needless crash victims", commented that a recent report on cabin safety in large transport aircraft prepared by the United States National Transportation Safety Board showed that "the authorities have been almost asleep on the question of crash forces in cabin safety for years."

That is quite an indictment. Other questions spring to mind about the safety of operating large twin-engined aircraft like the Airbus over long stretches of sea. That issue is facing us at the moment and not enough has been said about it, either by the CAA or by the Department of Transport. Cracks were recently discovered in the fuselages of aging jumbo jets and the CAA is following, and admitting that it is following, the directives issued by the Federal Aviation Administration.

All these matters deserve research and consideration. When he gave the Brancker memorial lecture in February, Sir John Dent, chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority, said:

"It is not the job of the CAA to sponsor research on aviation development and advances in technology in the field. That is the job of aircraft manufacturers, the avionics industry and the materials industry, but it is our job to understand the safety implications of developments in technology and use and to be able to set meaningful safety standards and tests. It used to be that the Government research establishments were fully available for research but economic stringency and perhaps some divergence of civil and defence research have largely closed off those resources. The situation is worrying, not least because our influence in international circles is directly dependent on our knowledge of and contribution to aviation safety."

His words are timely and important if we want air safety to be given its proper priority. One solution would be to fund the CAA and the accident investigation branch so that they could emulate the wider roles of the FAA and the NTSB in America. Such a solution would probably be both wasteful of resources and administratively unworkable on the scale we could afford.

[Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson]

Some suggest that the Airworthiness Requirements Board could fulfil the role, but it is something of a part-time body and scarcely suitable. Thus, one is drawn to the conclusion that a new body is needed standing apart from the CAA, the AAIB and the ARB but working closely with them. In effect, I am suggesting a national aviation safety centre. If such a centre was created, its obvious home would seem to be the College of Aeronautics at Cranfield. As I am sure my hon. Friend is aware, Cranfield has a long and distinguished record in aviation research. Its work on all aspects of aircraft design, manufacture and operation is recognised internationally. I suggest that it could fulfil the role of an aviation safety centre and give back to the United Kingdom the research facility to invest in air safety before the event, which must be to the benefit of the tens of millions of air passengers who fly in and out of the United Kingdom every year and the hundreds of millions of passengers who fly internationally.

1.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): I am sure that the House will be extremely grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson) for having raised the issue of air safety. As my hon. Friend knows, responsibility for civil aviation rests by statute with the Civil Aviation Authority. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State appoints the chairman of the authority and the members of its board and he must satisfy himself that the authority is discharging properly the various responsibilities which Parliament has entrusted to the CAA to ensure safety. However, neither my right hon. Friend nor I must seek to usurp the authority's responsibilities.

I am sure that the House will be the first to recognise that all the expertise in this crucial area lies with the authority, not with politicians and their officials. Not that many years ago, before the authority was set up, responsibility was divided between a number of bodies. Not surprisingly, this division of responsibility was not entirely satisfactory, so much so that the Edwards committee, which examined these matters extremely carefully in producing its report on British air transport in the 1970s, found:

"A situation has arisen in which each authority has felt obliged to act only within its own limited field of responsibility."

The committee concluded that it would be better to create conditions which guarded against that happening. It saw advantage in a pooling of responsibilities and information on safety.

Almost inevitably, as a result of its own logic, the committee was driven to recommend the formation of the Civil Aviation Authority, with a unified responsibility for safety matters. I believe that that logic still holds true today. The authority has a spectrum of safety responsibilities. Its safety services group has nearly 700 staff. Its role is to set standards and to satisfy itself that airlines are competent, that Britain's airports and aerodromes are safe, that pilots are properly trained and medically fit, and that aircraft are designed, built and maintained to the highest standards.

The duty of the national air traffic services is to ensure that aircraft can fly safely in Britain's crowded air space. It supplies air traffic control services, licenses controllers and inspects aerodromes to ensure that proper standards are maintained.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson rose——

Mr. Spicer: I shall give way to my hon. Friend, but I ask him to understand that I am under some pressure because of the timing of debates.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: It seems that what my hon. Friend says may be true of the CAA, but how can it be an effective safety regulator if it cannot research into the possible causes of future accidents?

Mr. Spicer: If my hon. Friend gives me the opportunity, and if the House will bear with me—I suspect that I shall stretch the time that has been alloted for this debate—I shall address myself directly to that issue.

The CAA's concerns for safety extend beyond the purely domestic. It maintains the closest contact with regulatory authorities overseas and plays a major role in the counsels of the International Civil Aviation Organisation. In my direct experience, the ICAO can move swiftly on occasions. I have in mind especially its reaction and response recently to aviation security. In direct response to my hon. Friend's question, the ICAO has agreed an amendment to the Chicago convention to cover the military interception of civil aircraft. The amendment needs to be ratified by a sufficient number of states if it is to be brought into force. A recurring problem stems from the need for mutual and international co-operation within the ICAO. I do not see, however, how we can overcome the need for compliance by member states.

My hon. Friend fears that international co-operation is at a low ebb and of a low quality. Sir John Dent, the authority's chairman, was right to voice his worries about some recent developments. Clearly the CAA and the Government must work to ensure that the traditional international spirit of co-operation in aviation safety matters is maintained, but we should not over-dramatise the problem.

Close co-operation is still the norm, not the exception. for example, there is a close relationship between all the major European agencies on joint airworthiness standards. Contact between the CAA and the FAA in the United States, following the Manchester disaster to which my hon. Friend referred, took place almost by the hour. As my hon. Friend will know, personnel from the FAA are permanently in Britain and, similarly, CAA personnel stay with the FAA.

My hon. Friend has also expressed concern about the sealing of overwing emergency exits on Boeing 747s. In response to that, the FAA organised, at the CAA's request, an evacuation test using a British Airways crew. I can report that the 90-second evacuation standard was met.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): With or without plimsolls?

Mr. Spicer: I suspect that that point was well taken on board before that evacuation. I am not sure, but I should be surprised if, after all the publicity, plimsolls were worn on this occasion. However, that would need to be confirmed.

Nevertheless, we must try, if only by the example set by the CAA, to ensure that some of the difficulties which have arisen recently do not recur.

My hon. Friend has asked about safety research. As he will know, safety research is currently funded by a combination of Government Departments, the CAA and the manufacturing and airline industries. It may be that the contribution from the industry will have to increase in the future. We are currently considering the whole question with the CAA and the Department of Trade and Industry. We shall certainly take into account the real concerns that my hon. Friend has expressed today and the points that he has raised in that context.

I suspect that it will be no solution simply to fund research programmes carried out by an independent body. It has been suggested that the Government should give Cranfield Institute of Aviation Research £2 million for unsponsored research. That would not help for at least two reasons. First, if there is a funding problem, it is no solution simply to say that the Government can solve it by giving a relatively small sum to one particular institution. My hon. Friend will probably accept that what is needed is a long-term viable solution. But, more importantly, research into aviation safety is co-ordinated by the Civil Aviation Research and Development Board.

We must avoid the danger of fragmenting the United Kingdom's research effort and in the process getting priorities wrong. It would be even less attractive to expect a body such as the Cranfield institute to devise or even recommend standards for safety, as my hon. Friend rather ingeniously suggested this afternoon.

As I have already mentioned, the strength of the CAA as a regulator of safety lies in the integration within one authority of responsibility for all the different areas of safety. We simply cannot begin to strip out certain areas and give them to some other body, however responsible or expert it may be. Not only would the authority begin to lose international credibility; we would also return inevitably to the days of the 1960s and before when too many organisations had responsibilities for safety questions. The Edwards report warned of the problems of divided responsibility. It gave us the solution in the form of the CAA, and that solution has worked well. It would be a serious mistake to begin to unpick the authority's role in safety matters.

It is, of course, true that no single body can carry out safety research on its own. No one has all the expertise. The CAA draws on research carried out in a number of centres, both here and overseas, in setting standards. But experience worldwide has shown that separating the setting of standards from their enforcement is a mistake.

The test of whether the present arrangements work, and of whether the CAA has properly discharged its responsibilities, lies in the safety record of civil aviation in this country. If we look at the general safety record over the past decade, the picture is reassuring, although we and the CAA must, as has been rightly insisted upon by hon. Members, guard against complacency. As my hon. Friend has said, 1985 was a bad year. But, as I think he conceded, in only three years in the previous decade were there fatal accidents involving fixed-wing aircraft of over 2,300 kg on the British register, carrying passengers for public transport. The record for passenger public transport operations involving helicopters was almost equally good, despite the harsh North sea environment in which so many services operate.

During the same period, the incidence of risk-bearing air misses involving civil aircraft more than halved, although the skies over the United Kingdom have become more and more crowded. The record is a good one, but, as I have said, we cannot risk complacency. That is why the CAA acted so swiftly after the tragic events at Manchester. Within hours of the accident, all similarly engined aircraft on the British register were subject to new inspection criteria and, where necessary, were grounded until safety checks had been completed. As evidence has emerged from the accident investigation, the authority has acted swiftly to introduce new standards for emergency exits and escape route markings. New regulations dealing with the fire resistance of seats were introduced three months before the accident. The authority has acted with the same speed and good sense over the question of cracks in Boeing 747s.

Neither the authority nor Parliament can ever take lightly the safety of aviation in this country. The standards of safety which the CAA demands may be the best achievable today, but it can and does strive to see how those standards can be improved. Parliament made a wise decision when it brought within one authority the responsibility for all the many aspects of safety regulations. We must not disturb that arrangement either by seeking to take away from the CAA matters in which it, and it alone, is expert, or by seeking to undermine its authority in other ways. It is right that we should all be concerned to ensure that the CAA promotes and maintains the highest safety standards. The record clearly shows that the authority has done that, and that where necessary it will act swiftly to remedy problems that unexpectedly come to light. However, I repeat that my hon. Friend has done us a great service by bringing this issue before us today.

Elderly People (Residential Care)

2.2 pm

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Although I am a Scottish Member of Parliament, most of my speech will be devoted to the problem of residential care for the elderly in England.

However, I shall first comment briefly on the situation in Scotland. Recent statistics from the House of Commons Library show that the regulation system in Scotland is not as sophisticated as that in England. The regularly produced statistics do not distinguish private homes from other non-local authority homes. They imply that the expansion of the private sector has not been as marked in Scotland as it has been in England. In 1979, there were 176 such private homes, whereas in 1984, the latest year for which figures are available, there were 193. That is a 10 per cent. increase. I do not know the reasons for that. In the same period, the increase in England was 100 per cent. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) has just informed me that the Tory-controlled Grampian regional authority has decided that it will build no further homes for the elderly in Scotland.

Generally, elderly people are more dependent than others on social services such as the National Health Service and community services provided by local councils such as home helps and sheltered housing. Most retirement pensioners have to struggle for existence with the help of supplementary benefit because the basic pension is so inadequate.

One basic requirement for elderly people is clean, comfortable and warm living accommodation at rents or charges they can pay without financial worry. Most old folk prefer their own independent accommodation where they can enjoy privacy and the possession of their own furniture and objects of sentimental value. The next best is sheltered housing provided, in the main, by the local council, with qualified staff, attendants, constant supervision and provision for privacy. I have had an exciting and moving experience of such provision in my constituency. It is organised by the Labour-controlled Fife authority.

Throughout the country there is a mix of provision by local councils—which are non-profit making—voluntary bodies and private, profit-making institutions. The community at large has an obligation to ensure that old folk and other vulnerable people, such as the mentally or physically disabled, are properly cared for by the community, paid for by the community. The private, profit-making sector has only a limited role.

I shall put some facts and figures on the record. Written answers to questions tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) on 2 March 1984, and by my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) on 26 July 1984, indicate the trend. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley asked for information on the provision of private and voluntary homes for the elderly since 1979 in the various regions in England and Wales. I shall not put all the figures on record, but I think that I should mention a few.

The figures cover a geographical stretch from the north-east of England to Devon. In 1979, Tyne and Wear had 32 privately run homes; in 1983, it had 39. West Yorkshire had 57 such homes in 1979, and 96 in 1983. Merseyside had 55 in 1979, and 101 in 1983. The west midlands had 25 in 1979 and 59 in 1983. Lincolnshire had 20 in 1979, and 44 in 1983. Norfolk had 41 in 1979 and 88 in 1983.

In the south of England the attractions are obvious. It has a milder climate, and a more desirable environment in many other ways. Dorset had 117 private residential homes in 1979 and 196 in 1983. East and West Sussex together had 294 in 1979 and 447 in 1983. Avon had 52 in 1979 and 96 in 1983. Devon had 217 in 1979 and 371 in 1983. If one adds up the figures for all those regions the total number of private residential homes was 910 in 1979 and 1,537 in 1983.

My hon. Friend the Member for Peckham, in a parliamentary question, asked for the local authority provision for March 1984. The total in England showed that there were 2,673 local authority homes, 4,090 in the private sector and 1 152 in the voluntary sector. Roughly half of the homes were provided by local authorities and slightly half the places available were local authority places.

It is worth noting that, in Dorset, which is predominantly Tory-controlled, there are only 37 local authority homes as compared with 215 private homes. In Hampshire, also predominantly Tory-controlled, there are 66 local authority homes and 233 private homes. In the Isle of Wight there are six local authority homes and 42 private homes. In Wiltshire there are 25 local authority homes and 66 private homes and in Somerset there are 27 local authority homes and 73 private homes.

In a written answer on 28 January the Minister said that the number of registered private residential homes in England for the elderly and disabled in March 1983 were 4,509, in March 1984 5,222, and in March 1985 6,443. That is a provisional figure.

On 12 March the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) initiated a debate on these matters. He made a quite extraordinary claim that the Government have "an excellent record on extending care in the community."—[Official Report, 12 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 1056.]

The hon. Member cited as evidence the expansion in the national network of private profit-making homes for the old. The hon. Member proceeded to enumerate the many financial problems that inevitably arise from the clash between the desires of the proprietors of these private homes to make profits and the inadequacy of the means of the residents, subsisting, as many do as pensioners, on supplementary benefits.

The Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) who replied to that debate sought to make the best of a bad job. He welcomed the rapid growth in the private industry but then stated that, in 1978, 7,000 old folks had been helped by supplementary benefit to pay their fees. In other words the Government augmented the profits of the private owners.

In 1978 the cost to the Exchequer was £6 million. The Under-Secretary went on to state that in 1984 the situation had got out of hand and the cost was £190 million. The Government were pouring public money into the coffers of the private owners. The Minister admitted as much. He admitted that the scheme was open to exploitation and abuse.

An article in the journal Community Care, on 8 March this year, gave examples and stated:

"According to one estimate, if you get yourself a property and fill it with 12 elderly residents you have a guaranteed income of £60,000 a year."

The same journal referred later to an organisation called

"Care Concern, founded by David Rattray, former deputy director of Denbighshire SSD, whose homes for emotionally disturbed adolescents and the mentally handicapped bring him well over £1 million a year."

When my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham spoke in a debate on these matters on 13 March, she, too, gave examples of what can happen in those private homes. She cited the Inglehurst nursing home in Blackpool, where "the owners engaged in twice-daily drinking sprees, failed to administer drugs safely and fed their residents inadequately, and where there was inadequate staffing and residents were kept in squalor." — [Official Report, 13 March 1986; Vol. 93, c 1149.]

Mainly as a result of my hon. Friend's representations, that home was eventually closed, but not before getting £50,000 a year from the DHSS — in other words, £50,000 of taxpayers' money. My hon. Friend also mentioned two cases of fraud by private homes in Kent. She raised those matters with the Government, but to date, apparently, there has been no action.

In the article in Community Care to which I referred, Mr. Dick Clough of the Social Care Association was reported to be worried by the fact that the market in old folks' needs "is one ripe for profit making".

That view was eagerly shared by a private company called Associated Nursing Services Ltd. It was planning to buy Stewart lodge, belonging to Hammersmith and Fulham council, along with the 29 residents whose average age was 88. Only the imminence of a by-election in that area stopped that.

Incidentally, the proposed sale was to have gone through with the support of the Tory and Liberal councillors in that area, and only in the past few days have those people reneged on that because they saw the great disaster that could befall them politically if they went through with that sale. That was an unbelievable act of social irresponsibility. Only public outrage and the imminence of the by-election stopped it.

Another organisation has shown that it fully understands the enormous profits that can be made out of the old folk. A brochure issued by the Investment and Pensions Advisory Service was quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham in the debate to which I referred. It refers to investment in old folks' homes as a "lucrative, long-term opportunity for large-scale capital growth."

Under the Government's business expansion scheme, people can get grants of taxpayers' money to engage in that practice. I should be interested to know how much public money has been given out under that scheme to foster that private industry.

The Government have shown clearly that they believe in the private system and in the solution of the problem by private enterprise and privately financed homes; by leaving the problem increasingly to what the Prime Minister describes as caring capitalism, the magic of the market. We should leave it all to the market and the profit motive, and the old people's problems will be solved. There is massive evidence that the Government believe in the increased privatisation of the services, especially the accommodation requirements of our old people.

Handsome profits are being made at the expense of the old, and the taxpayers too, because the Government have admitted that the DHSS — the taxpayers — were paying £10 million a year to private homes in 1979 and £190 million in 1984. God knows what the figure will be now.

The DHSS coughs up as much as £180 per person per week in a private profit-making home. Therefore, a wee 10-bed home can received £1,800 a week or a little less than £100,000 a year of taxpayers' money to look after those people. The local authority is responsible for examination and inspection to see that the homes are up to the mark.

While all that has been going on, the local councils have been directed and bullied into spending less and less on residential care and other services such as home helps, which helps to drive the old folks into the private profit-making sector. It is not many years since Professor Galbraith wrote an eloquent book on that philosophy entitled "Public Squalor and Private Affluence". It is interesting that the Minister grins at that. "Private Affluence and Public Squalor" describes what is happening in this area now. By treating all public expenditure, public investment and public services as inefficient, wasteful and bad, hence justifying the curbing of all that is public, the Government are driving people into the private, profit-making sector, whether it be housing, health, education, pensions, social security or, as in this case, old folk's homes.

The social services as we have known them since the war are being strangled by the Government and the Social Security Bill currently before the House underlines that fact. That is why millions of people up and down the country are full of foreboding for the future of the services as we have known them for the past 40 years.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) for raising this subject. I am particularly grateful to him for suggesting that he would like to put some facts and figures on record. We have not had any so far and I should like to offer some.

He talked about the social service being strangled. Never, in real terms, has more been spent on personal social services than is being spent today. He talked about the social security budget being destroyed, or whatever words he used. Never, in real terms, has more been spent. Indeed, there has been an increase of over 20 per cent. in real terms, and most of that has gone on an increased number of beneficiaries, including about 800,000 pensioners and increased rates of benefit paid under the social security system.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central spoke about pensioners. He knows, but perhaps as a member of the Opposition he is not prepared to admit, that the state retirement pension is 10 percentage points higher than it was when we came into office. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman is aware that a pensioner couple on a supplementary pension now receive £2·96 a week more than they would have done when the hon. Gentleman and his party were in government. That is the measure of the so-called stranglehold of personal social services and retirement pensions to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. They are the facts and figures which must be put on record.

The hon. Gentleman is happy that apparently in Scotland his constituents are denied the choice that is available in England between local authority provision, voluntary home provision or private provision. He smiles at that, just as I smiled when he quoted Professor Galbraith. It would be difficult to find anyone more exploded as an economic theorist than Professor Galbraith, other than Mr. Marx, to whom the hon. Gentleman may also pay some tribute.

It may have escaped the hon. Gentleman's notice that most people in this country — including I would imagine, the hon. Gentleman's constituents in Fife, Central — prefer a choice. If they have to go into a home, they prefer an opportunity to choose which sort of home they should go into. The hon. Gentleman seems to object to the fact that the Government are prepared to pay, through supplementary benefit, the scale of fees that are available. For those who live in homes for the elderly, we are prepared to pay £120 a week. For those in nursing homes who are physically disabled and below pensionable age, we are prepared to pay £230 a week.

To the hon. Gentleman that is an outrage. It is something that he condemns. However, the great majority of people, not only the elderly but their relatives, welcome and applaud it. The great majority of people recognise that there has to be a limit. They realise that there has been an explosion in numbers. In 1978, 7,000 people were receiving residential care fees. In 1984, that figure had risen to 42,000. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that increase in the provision made by the state to a particularly vulnerable section of the community, but he does not. He condemns it.

He does so because so many of these people have the effrontery to seek, in co-operation with the social security budget of the Department of Health and Social Security, entry into private nursing homes. The hon. Gentleman wants them to go into local authority homes. He has picked out some bad private homes. We must continue to seek out the bad private residential homes and nursing homes. That is precisely why an inspection system was introduced two years ago to supervise home care provision and the registration fee system, to which I shall refer in a moment.

Does the hon. Gentleman say that there are no bad local authority homes? Let him discuss that question with his hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman). He should discuss with her what happened in Southwark at the appropriately named Aneurin Bevan home. Let him discuss with her whether those old people would prefer to be in an adequately inspected, properly run voluntary residential or private residential home or nursing home or in a local authority home in Southwark. The hon. Gentleman knows the answer to that question.

The Government recognise the importance of residential care for the elderly. That is why so large a part of our national resources has been devoted to it, why fees have been increased to the levels that I have already mentioned, why we are conducting a study to make sure that fees are kept in line with inflation and why the problems confronting particular categories are examined carefully and kept under careful review.

I have no doubt that the mix that we have achieved, and that we shall continue to maintain and improve, of local authority statutory provision and voluntary and private sector provision is the right way to go. We do not share the hon. Gentleman's vision that that percentage of our community — happily a small percentage — who need residential accommodation should be accommodated willy-nilly, without choice, in local authority homes. Of course there are good local authority homes, and we applaud and support them. But there are also good voluntary and private residential homes. That is a mix, which implies individual choice, freedom and responsibility, that most people welcome.

The hon. Gentleman finds it reprehensible that there were 910 homes in 1979 and that that figure has increased to 1,537 by 1983. I do not find that figure dismaying. I find it something to be pleased about. It means that our elderly population have a greater choice and that the support that the Government are able to offer to them through the social security system, which is constantly kept under review, can be deployed throughout the whole sector of community care.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central has a deep-rooted antagonism to private enterprise and to the operation of the market. I suggest—perhaps I would be wasting my time if I tried to make this suggestion to the hon. Gentleman —that most people consider that, having more homes in the market and more competition, obtaining better value for money, whether private or public, must be in the interests of society and of elderly people. We know that it is a great deal of public money.

Of course, standards must be maintained and that is precisely why we have taken such care in our activities with local authorities in terms of registration and inspection of these homes. Recently, we announced a substantial increase in the registration fee for private homes, from £100 to £500. To put it mildly, that measure was not welcomed by owners of residential homes. We did that because we attached great importance to the proper inspection of these homes to ensure that standards are adequate to meet the needs of our elderly people and to ensure that local authorities do not face additional burdens.

We are proud of our achievements in the promotion and preservation of residential care for the elderly. Happily, only a small minority need this accommodation. The objective must be, as the hon. Gentleman recognised, for the majority of elderly people to stay in their own homes. That is why I am glad that personal social services, the number of home helps and our spending generally on the elderly, including retirement pensioners, are at record levels.

Runaway Children (London)

2.31 pm

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): I appreciate having the opportunity to raise a problem of growing concern throughout the Western world — runaway children. There is no comprehensive policy or practice covering runaway children, but an encouraging project has been set up by the Children's Society to meet this worrying need.

There is evidence that this is a growing problem throughout the Western world. It has been estimated that more than 4,000 young people ran away to London alone last year. In America, the number has reached epidemic proportions, with the federal Government spending $20 million a year dealing with the needs of runaway children and their families. These children are especially vulnerable to crime, either as victims or as perpetrators. They can easily become involved in drugs, vice and prostitution — street crime — and be in great moral danger.

Before I became a Member, I was for many years on the executive of the Children's Society and resigned only when my husband became chairman.

I am pleased that similar rules do not apply in this place to the joint activities of husbands and wives. During the 1970s, there was great concern about the plight of the homeless and the serious lack of housing for young people. The film "Johnny Come Home", which was based on a genuine case, aroused great public anxiety. A number of agencies, such as Alone in London, Centrepoint, and the Soho project, joined to see what they could do. Coinciding with its centenary in 1981, the Children's Society inevitably began to think about its roots and background. It thought that it would be appropriate to devote its energies to the problem of homeless young people.

The Children's Society was founded in 1881 by a young civil servant named Edward Rudolf, who taught at the Sunday school at St. Anne's, Vauxhall, where I used to teach. Mr. Rudolf noticed that two boys who had been regularly attending the Sunday school suddenly went missing. He searched for them and found them begging outside the local gasworks. It transpired that the boys' father had died, leaving the mother with no income and a family to support. She was not prepared to allow the whole family to go into the workhouse, so she decided that the two young boys, aged 10 or 11, should be able to survive for themselves.

When looking for a home for the boys, Edward Rudolf discovered that, unlike the free churches, the established church had no answer to the problem of homeless children or runaways. As a result, a society known as the Waifs and Strays was formed, responding to the needs of thousands of children on the streets of Britain's great cities. In its first annual report, the Children's Society stated that there were an estimated 20,000 homeless children in London alone.

In its attempt to respond to the present day needs of children on the streets following discussions with other interested agencies, and with the assistance of Camden and Westminster social services departments, with the advice and co-operation of the Metropolitan police and with significant resources from the Minister's Department, the Children's Society was able to start the central London teenage project. The project is based in a large terraced house in north London. It has a kitchen, bedrooms for 12, meeting rooms and rooms for private interviews and looks like any other house in the street. Efforts have been made not to publicise the address, so that the young people who come to the house can feel safe from casual visits or intrusions. Young people under the age of 17—19 if in the care of a local authority—who are found homeless on the streets of London are referred to the project by the police, voluntary agencies or the social services departments.

It is not surprising that many of these young people arrive at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning. When a new person comes to the house, the staff try to establish trust as the basic requirement for working with the young person. The staff then make contact with the individual's home, but that is only attempted with the young person in attendance, so that he or she knows what is being said.

The staff are clearly in a sensitive position, knowing that they have a duty towards the young person, but, at the same time, if they lose that young person's confidence the young person may well resort to running away again. The young people are given at least 48 hours before their future is decided. During that time, there are negotiations between the project staff, parents, local authorities and other agencies. Parents who wish to contact their children are given free telephone access.

Crucially it is important that help is provided to stop that young person from running away once more. Some young people change their residential setting and others are received into local authority care. In other cases, collaboration, co-operation and essential understanding are attempted between the parents and the child.

Each young person and each family is treated individually so that their solutions are tailored to meet their cases. Above all, the project is followed up with a telephone call to the young person one month later.

On the basis of the 200 young people who have stayed at the centre since it was founded, various findings have emerged. I applaud the way in which the Children's Society has researched the findings of its project. It is only too easy spontaneously to set up an agency to meet a perceived need and then make no rigorous investigation to discover whether it is in fact effectively meeting that need.

The majority of the young people at the centre were between 13 and 16 years of age, although the full age range was between 11 and 21. Of those children, 63 per cent. had run away from home. When exploring the reasons for their running away, breakdown of communications and a lack of understanding between parents and the child were the reasons most frequently given. There appeared to be an inability to discuss problems in the family. Physical and sexual violence were also all too frequently present. It is understandable that child sexual abuse, which has been so powerfully highlighted this week by the NSPCC, is a topic that is particularly difficult for families to deal with, and running away from home can seem to be the solution for the young person involved. Problems of bullying at school and of perceived failure were also mentioned.

Equally worrying, one third of the children had run away from local authority care, which raises questions about the quality of that provision. They mentioned unhappiness, the desire for independence and dislike of the children's home or of the area from which they had come. Bullying by peers was again mentioned. For those children, the solution seemed to be to abandon the home.

[Mrs. Virginia Bottomley]

Forty per cent. of the children came from London and the south-east, the others from all over the country. When asked what help or advantage had been provided, they said that the project had helped them to think and to sort themselves out, perhaps fulfilling the function that grandparents or distant relations can play in less fragmented families. The project highlighted for young people the dangers of trying to survive in London and the staff were seen as trustworthy and available, demonstrating that the project meets an important need at this stage.

A few key issues need to be addressed. The co-operation of the police has clearly been vital in the development of the project. They need to relax their enforcement of the law which obliges them to return children and young people to their parents or guardians. In the review of child care law, some voluntary agencies have argued for special treatment in dealing with the delicate borderland between the child as an independent person and the child as the responsibility of the parents. If the agency enforces return to an unpopular home, the problem may simply recur, but on the second occasion the young person is unlikely to seek help from an agency. That is not to misunderstand the deep unhappiness of parents whose children have gone missing and who desperately want some source of reassurance or certainty as to what has happened to their children.

A further issue focused by the project is the need for centralised reporting of runaways. The Metropolitan police missing persons bureau does valiant work, but many people in the House and elsewhere feel that there should be more rigorous provision for the reporting of missing persons, especially young people. My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) has urged the Government to establish a special unit in the Home Office to pay particular attention to young people who run away.

With regard to the care provided by local authorities, once again the message is that it is essential that young people should be considered and consulted in plans for their future. Too often children feel that the only way to gain any control of their own destiny is to flee. There are messages there for social work training and child care practice generally in making young people feel that they are being consulted, their views heard, and attention paid to their needs.

The contribution and assistance of the Department of Health and Social Security are clearly very important to the project and to similar facilities run by other groups. The recent announcement of the £25,000 grant has made a significant difference. However, I also believe that the proposals in the Budget substantially to improve the tax relief given on charitable donations should dramatically benefit the Children's Society in common with many other charities. Not only are single gifts by companies, up to an amount equal to 3 per cent. of the dividends paid by the company to its shareholders, to be exempt from tax, but payroll giving by individuals is to be encouraged. Employees will be able to give to charities through deductions from wages or salaries.

I hope that, with a greater awareness of the need, individuals and groups throughout the country will take the opportunity to devote resources to a service which, in my view, is fundamentally one that is best met by the voluntary agencies. Ministers are frequently urged in the House to make more local authority provision to meet various needs. I feel that the voluntary agencies have a legitimate and powerful role in pioneering social care and in meeting as yet unrecognised needs. Especially in the case of young people who have frequently been subject to perhaps less than favourable local authority experiences in the past, that seems to me to be an eminently proper and appropriate use of resources.

Finally, apart from leading to more charitable giving and support, I hope that greater awareness of projects such as this will lead to greater sensitivity in the children's home areas. It is important that the signs of unhappiness in children should be recognised, whether at school or at home or through the clergy and all the others in the community who need increasingly to recognise that the solution to the local problems is only rarely to flee. We know only too well from too many cases over the years of the dangers to the young people and the damage that can result—quite apart from the misery suffered by their caretakers—if they choose that way out.

I appreciate having had this opportunity to talk about the central London teenage project, which was developed by the Children's Society at a time when my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) was chairman of the society and which has, I feel, made a particularly important contribution.

2.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am happy to respond to this debate. Yet again, my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) has raised a most important subject. I believe that the matter has never yet been considered in the House. As she said, my hon. Friend has been closely involved for some time with that very important voluntary organisation, the Church of England Children's Society, before the little local difficulty that she encountered because my hon. Friend and her husband the Under-Secretary of State for Transport became chairman. Day by day I learn more about my hon. Friend's deep knowledge and experience in those areas. The revelation that — on top of everything else that she has to offer—she even taught in the same Sunday school as Edward Rudolf adds yet more distinction to her record.

This phenomenon of runaway children in London is a serious one. It is not new. In effect, it has been with us for centuries. We have some figures, although by the nature of the subject they are not reliable. I am advised that in 1985, 2,982 children, of whom 869 were younger than 14 and 2,113 were aged between 14 and 17, were reported to the Metropolitan police to be missing within the Metropolitan police area. At the end of last year, only 146 remained missing. However, every day that a child is lost causes some relative, parent or carer to suffer acute concern. We should not be led wholly astray by some of the more lurid descriptions of what might happen. The dangers of prostitution and entering the drugs scene exist, and we must be alert to them. Many children in those statistics return home in a matter of days. Nevertheless, it is important that appropriate help should be available in London and all our major cities for children who run away or are reported missing.

There is no problem about those who are ready to be found. The police and social services departments of the London boroughs are only too anxious to restore them to their homes. The police respond immediately to those who are truly missing, and actively use all their resources to find the child. Tragically, some children who disappear are abducted, perhaps seriously assaulted and sometimes killed. Such cases of horror and distress cause us all anxiety.

The police respond in such cases with the greatest commitment. Many children return home late and are unaware of the consequences of that. If a child disappears, it is vital to contact the police as early as possible. They will ensure that everything possible is done with the utmost speed to trace the child. An essential part of that is the need for immediate publicity in those crucial early stages of disappearance. Although the television and radio bring us all problems, they also bring us the benefit of reaching a wide audience. Certainly, they have been used to great advantage, and, obviously, we shall continue to ensure that that is the case.

Voluntary organisations and local authorities, especially in the London area, naturally have an important part to play. Like my hon. Friend I wish to emphasise the great significance of the Church of England Children's Society project — the central London teenage project. As my hon. Friend said, it grew from the concern of voluntary and statutory agencies in the west end about the growing number of under-age young runaways in the west end. It provided a breathing space for a few days for them to talk things over with an understanding and sympathetic worker so that an acceptable resolution of their problem could be found.

Young people relied mainly on the voluntary agencies in the west end for support and help which at that time had neither the legal authority nor the resources to meet the needs of this vulnerable group. That frequently led to young people being sent straight back home and back to precisely the problems from which they had sought to escape, resulting all too often in youngsters running away again and failing to be contacted by the voluntary agencies. That meant that a number of young, vulnerable people were surviving alone in central London, prey to the dangers of street existence, exploitation, crime, prostitution and drugs.

The project aims to assess the needs of young people referred to it by other agencies. Its operation seems to be admirable. I understand that the project provides a safe house and residential provision for young people under the age of 17, or in care up to the age of 19, and that that is an effective contribution to the problem.

As my hon. Friend said, recently we were happily able to provide a capital sum of £50,000 towards the purchase price of the accommodation, and we have given £25,000 towards the running costs in the coming financial year. Certainly, we believe that this is an example of the way in which we can co-operate with the statutory sector on the one hand and the voluntary sector on the other.

I endorse the point my hon. Friend made about the importance of the measures announced by our right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his Budget. Those offer opportunities not only to companies but to individuals for payroll giving. Those measures will take effect from April 1987. I take this opportunity and shall take many others to urge all the charities in the personal social services sector not to hang back but to seize this exciting opportunity that has been provided by the Chancellor. The charities should make sure that the opportunity is used to good effect.

We are looking for a combination of action by central Government — whether through the DHSS or other Government Departments — by local authorities and by voluntary organisations. In many areas, whether in the area of runaway children in London or in any of the other personal social service areas with which my hon. Friend is familiar, it is a combination of action that can provide the best answer. Quite clearly, the state cannot provide all the resources, nor can it provide all the expertise or the insight and the care that are needed. As I have often said in the House, much help can be generated in society and we can mobilise society to help solve these problems. The Church of England teenage project in London that my hon. Friend spoke about is a splendid example of that genre and I commend it as an excellent means of dealing with a special problem.

Mrs. Bottomley: Does my hon. Friend agree that projects of this sort have the added advantage of being organised and funded primarily by voluntary agencies? Many young people who use the project feel somewhat disenchanted with statutory agencies.

Mr. Whitney: I agree with my hon. Friend. That is an important point and of course my hon. Friend is speaking from experience. It contrasts rather interestingly with the last debate during which the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) seemed to think that only the statutory agencies can do good.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): He did not say that.

Mr. Whitney: He seems to believe that. The hon. Gentleman should read his speech. The most effective way is a partnership and the partnership to which my hon. Friend has drawn attention is a splendid example.

Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council

2.58 pm

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): I am grateful for the opportunity to say a few words about the Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council report, and especially the college education part of it. What I say will almost be the last gasp of the House before the Easter recess, but of course the Minister will have the last gasp. There has already been a debate on the subject in the Scottish Grand Committee, but I am sure the Minister will agree that things have moved on since then, and, as we are almost at the close of submissions in the consultation period, this is an appropriate time for the Minister to comment on the report.

The importance of the issue for the Opposition is examplified by the fact that we have in the House my hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton). They are two of our Front Bench spokesmen in the Scottish team. I am worried about the colleges of education and about recommendations 913 and 914 in the report. I support some of the other recommendations, but we are not dealing with those today.

I cannot understand why the report contains a gratuitous recommendation about the colleges of education. According to the report, it is with some reluctance that its authors make that recommendation. I wish that they had allowed their reluctance to overcome them and not come up with any recommendations. They were not asked to consider making such a recommendation. That was not included specifically in their remit, and the recommendation is somewhat gratuitous.

There have been two reviews of the colleges of education in Scotland within the past decade. There was one in 1977, and a second one in 1980. The uncertainty that has hung over the colleges over the past decade has been unhelpful, and to raise further uncertainty is doubly unhelpful.

Some have suggested that the vice-chairman of STEAC, Mr. Tom Bone, might have influenced the recommendation to which I have referred to safeguard the position of Jordanhill college of education. I hope that that is not the case. I must say, however, that I did wonder where the recommendation had come from and how it had arisen again.

In reality, the substantial question mark that hangs over the colleges should not be there at all. Instead, the question mark should be hanging over the committee's recommendations and its projections of pupil numbers and, secondly, the consequent effect on the number of students and teachers in the colleges.

I received today the Scottish Education Department's statistical bulletin, which contradicts what has been advanced by STEAC. I hope the Minister will confirm that the bulletin shows that in 1984 there were 438,000 primary pupils in Scotland, and projects that in 1987 there will be 334,000. I acknowledge that that is a downturn, but by the end of the century there will be 484,000, on a conservative estimate, if one might use the term.

It is probably safer and more sensible to consider the high variant. It is relatively easy to close colleges of education, but it is difficult to open them or to make available additional places. In considering the high variant, we see that numbers rise steadily until the year 2000, when we shall return to the 1979-80 level. It should be said that the previous review took place after 1979-80.

The SED's statistics contradict those which STEAC has put forward. Equally spectacularly, the General Teaching Council, which is the Secretary of State's adviser on the supply of teachers, disagreed recently with the STEAC report and its recommendations and said that the colleges should remain open. The council is an extremely powerful body. All relevant statistics are available to it and its membership embraces the entire breadth of education knowledge. Represented on it are local authorities, the colleges of education and many other organisations. With no disrespect to STEAC, one or two business men and one or two educationists do not have the same depth of knowledge as the members of the council.

The STEAC report presupposes no improvement in the quality of education, no improvement in the pupil-teacher ratio and no in-service training. I hope that the next Government, who we know will be a Labour Government, will want to see an improvement in the quality of education. That will be difficult to achieve if the colleges of education do not exist. I am arguing that the seven colleges must stay open. If there is a temporary downturn in teacher numbers in the next year or two, that can be accommodated, especially in the larger colleges, by a downturn in the intake. We must take account of the upsurge in demand that will take place in the ensuing years.

I wish to concentrate my remarks on the Craigie college of education, which is in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger), the Secretary of State for Defence. The college serves the whole of Ayrshire and Dumfries and Galloway and is our community college. I do not concentrate on Craigie because I have no concern for the other colleges. Indeed, I have concern for them all, and some of the arguments that can be advanced in support of the other six colleges are those that apply to Craigie. I shall concentrate on Craigie because I know it well and because there are six arguments which relate to it and which the representatives of Craigie advanced forcefully to the Minister. I am sure the Minister will agree that they produced an excellent and forceful submission.

The first is a geographical argument which applies equally to a number of the other colleges, particularly Aberdeen. There is a concentration of teacher education in Scotland. It is becoming highly centralised compared with England and Wales, and the Craigie submission has a map to show that. Craigie serves Dumfries and Galloway and Strathclyde, along with Jordanhill and St. Andrew's colleges. Those two regions have a population equivalent to Wales. But whereas Wales has 11 institutions with pre-service training spread throughout the country, west Scotland, equivalent in size and population, has only three. If the recommendations went ahead, there could be more centralisation in Scotland.

I today received a letter from the Minister, answering some points that I had raised, in which he says that if any of the closures go ahead, outstations could be provided.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): The Minister has said that before.

Mr. Foulkes: Exactly. My hon. Friend used to teach at Hamilton, and he knows only too well. The evidence of Craiglockhart, Hamilton and Callendar Park is not encouraging. Outstation provision remains in only two, and it is in one or two rented classrooms, with only a handful of staff.

A local college knows the schools, and the schools know the college. The link between the school and college is important. The majority of the output of Craigie college finds employment in south-west Scotland. The Craigie product has a high reputation. STEAC mentions the importance of continuing education, and that would be helped by having a college, not an outstation, with all the range of expertise, support and advice that only a college can offer.

The second argument in favour of Craigie is its good employment record. That is not easy in these days of high unemployment, as the Minister knows. The Craigie product is known in the south-west of Scotland as being of a high standard. In January 1984, 82 per cent. of the output was employed, compared with between 16 and 46 per cent. in other colleges. In January 1985 it was 73 per cent., and in January 1986 it was up to 92 per cent. Craigie-trained teachers are a high quality product.

The third argument, which is one which I do not advance, but it has been put forward by STEAC, the Public Accounts Committee and others, relates to cost-effectiveness and efficiency. I am not sure that it is the most important argument, but as it has been argued I shall counter it. The cost per student at Craigie is the lowest of all—£3,421 per student, as we see from page 153 of the report. If Craigie were to be closed—I am not saying that the Minister would contemplate it—students would have to go to Glasgow to be trained and there would be the extra cost of travel from Stranraer, Dumfries and Ayrshire up to Glasgow. There would also be the problem of the extra cost of accommodation in Glasgow, which, as my hon. Friends know, is already greatly strained, as Glasgow has two universities and other colleges.

Fourthly, nothing could provide a stronger case than the efficient use of accommodation in Craigie. Half of Craigie college is used by 400 students from Ayr college—formerly Ayr technical college. Out of the total complement of 800 students at Craigie, that leaves, as even the Minister will be able to work out, 400. The teacher training complement is currently 340, and with the daily community use that brings Craigie up to 800 people regularly using that college—up to its complement—so there is no question that Craigie is not being used to capacity.

The fifth argument is service to the community. The other day the whole theatre at Craigie college was packed with people from all parties, including the Minister's, and all walks of life supporting the college and what it does for the community. People from the Open University, the social work department and community education all said how useful Craigie is to the community.

I am grateful to the Minister for replying to a question today and for mentioning all the representations that he has received. Many of them come from Ayrshire, including from the presbytery there. Robert Burns would not dare to stand against the recommendations of the presbytery of Ayr, and the presbytery of Ayr unanimously supports the retention of Craigie college.

The final argument concerns the partnership between college and university, which STEAC also says is important. For the past 40 years Craigie college has had a superb partnership with the University of Strathclyde. It is significant that the principal and academic board of Strathclyde university have praised Craigie, and have made submissions to the Minister to ignore the STEAC recommendations and keep Craigie serving the west of Scotland.

Those are the specific arguments for Craigie, and many of them apply equally to the other colleges. I am in favour of all seven staying open. But if one final argument was needed to convince the Minister and the Secretary of State about the foolishness of closing any college, it would be that they should look at those which have already been closed by the Minister or his predecessor. In a written answer to me on 3 February the Minister confirmed—[Interruption.] I must say, I do not like that barracking from my own Front Bench.

In a written answer to me on 3 February the Minister confirmed that there are still no firm proposals for the long-term use of Callendar Park college of education, which was closed about five years ago. No revenue at all has accrued to the Government from that. Moreover, we all recall the scandal of the sale of the Hamilton college buildings at a knockdown price by the Minister's predecessor, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher). They were sold to a somewhat dubious character who is also involved in a pretty sinister campaign for law and order, with which the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) is connected. To sell Hamilton college to a sort of Mary Whitehouse in trousers was not a sensible step. I hope that the Minister will get his inspectors to look at what is going on in that private institution. It would bear very careful scrutiny.

It is much better to keep the colleges, which are a vital part of Scottish education, serving their communities in the variety of ways that I have outlined. During the next few weeks the Minister and the Secretary of State will have to take account of the various recommendations. The Minister said that one or two supported the STEAC recommendations. I cannot think who they are. I suppose that one might be Jordanhill college, but there cannot be many of them. I see that the Minister is nodding, so that must be the only one.

Educational and community interests, as well as many other people, are overwhelmingly against the closure of any of the seven colleges. I think that I speak on behalf of all Members of Parliament for the south-west of Scotland, and on behalf of councillors and the community as a whole, when I say that there will be a monumental outcry if Craigie is not kept open. Surely the Minister and even this Government believe that Scottish education is a vital part of Scottish life.

3.13 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on raising this important matter in such a timely fashion, as we are just coming to the end of the consultation period. He has given the Minister fair notice that it is an anxious issue, which is likely to arouse strong feelings before it runs its course. It is, therefore, important that we should have a chance to consider it, albeit briefly today.

It is an anxious issue because an aura of uncertainty has surrounded the colleges of education for a long time. The Minister will be aware that during the past decade the student population has fallen by about 53 per cent., which represents a substantial drop. There has been a rather sad record of closures. The history of Hamilton and Callendar Park underlines some of the difficulties that can arise.

I have considerable admiration for the work put in by Donald MacCallum and his colleagues on the STEAC report. It is on the whole a lively and largely optimistic report. The last passages on the colleges of education were sparingly phrased and skeletal in their arguments. The conclusion was not buttressed by substantial argument. I found that part of the report unconvincing.

Paragraph 5.39 of the report contained the key factor on which the committee based its recommendations. The assumption was that there would be a peak in the number of students in pre-service training of about 5,000. Everyone who has looked even casually at the arguments will know that the Scottish Education Department has taken a more optimistic view of the number of places which are likely to be needed. In 1984-85, the estimate was 5,250, but the estimate for 1985-86 was 7,380. That figure came out in evidence to the Public Accounts Committee.

In the same period, the number of places for primary school training, which is particularly important to Craigie, the esimated rise was from 1,780 to 3,500. That underlines what we already suspected—that the statistical base on which the recommendation was made is not made out. That is the kindest way of putting it.

The Minister suggested at Scottish Question Time yesterday that the report was well considered. I do not dissent from that as a generalisation, but, on the face of it, that cannot be applied to the particular passage to which I referred.

We must also take into account the need for growth in in-service training. The SED predicted a small decrease in the number of other users of colleges which I do not accept. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley that to talk, for example, of the development of outstations is not entirely satisfactory. I thought that outstations had something to do with sheep-rearing in Western Australia. It is not a satisfactory answer in terms of being a substitute for the in-depth service that a college of education can give to a community.

I recognise the need for up-to-date information. The Public Accounts Committee said that forcefully. The Minister talked about the computerised analysis of available accommodation and course requirements. Somebody is obviously trying to make him literate, since they cannot make him numerate. I hope that the Minister will take seriously the view that the case for closure has not been made out. Much depends upon what is fed into a computer and who assesses the results. We are anxious that not too much weight is given to Treasury evidence but that proper weight is given to education priorities when reaching a final decision.

We do not deny the case for rationalisation. There will be changes in staff-pupil ratios. There may be a case for a more efficient use of resources and courses. I hope that the case for further closures will not be accepted when there is no substantial argument for making those closures.

We must put an end to the uncertainty, but we do not want to be rushed into a narrow, book-keeping approach to the exercise when so much is at stake.

3.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): I congratulate the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on his success in securing this debate on the report of the Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council and its implications for Scottish colleges of education. As the hon. Member recognised, in one sense the debate is peculiarly timely because it is the last official day for comments to be submitted on the STEAC report.

On the other hand it is untimely for me and for Opposition Members, as it is extremely difficult for me to comment. We cannot take any decisions on the report until we have fully analysed the representations received. However, I congratulate the hon. Member on putting forward his case, particularly his case for Craigie college. It is unfortunate that he spoilt the objective tenor of his remarks by his wholly unjustified remarks about my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher).

I remind the House of the policy which was confirmed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland during the debate on STEAC in the Scottish Grand Committee in Edinburgh in January. The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley also referred to that debate. My right hon. and learned Friend said that the consultation period would continue until Easter and that no decisions would be taken until views had been received during that period. We have received a large number of views. We have received a petition from the Scottish members of the National Union of Students. The first signature on the petition was that of the leader of the Opposition. No doubt the House will wish him well in his studies as a Scottish undergraduate.

We are not rigid about the closing date for representations. I recognise there may be some comments that will be received during the Easter period. We have received about a hundred representations and indeed, at the rate at which comments have been received—I have not yet checked on this morning's post — we shall receive well over a hundred specifically about the colleges of education. However, the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and the Doon Valley will recognise that my answer concerns the most up-to-date information. I will of course report to the House on the decisions taken in relation to STEAC.

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, as I am aware I have taken up much of the time of the debate. He has confirmed the information in his original written answer but will he bring it up to date and confirm to the House that the vast majority of representations in relation to the recommendation of STEAC on colleges of education are against its recommendations and in favour of keeping all seven colleges open?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Member will recognise that there are 23 recommendations in the STEAC report. Some of them are important and are widely accepted. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and the Doon Valley will recognise that the report, in general, has been well received. I confirm to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and the Doon Valley that it is true that the majority of the representations we have received in relation to the recommendations on the colleges of education have been opposed to the STEAC recommendations.

STEAC recommended that steps should be taken to reduce the number of colleges of education to three non-denominational institutes plus one Roman Catholic college. Hon. Members who represent the official Opposition have given us their views on that. The Liberals and the Social Democratic party did not express their views yesterday and are not present today. It would be helpful if I told the House I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, North East (Mr. Henderson) for informing me that at the Educational Institute of Scotland council the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) confirmed the alliance view that the majority of Scottish colleges of education should be retained. Perhaps I should add that at least for the Conservative party and doubtless for the Labour party, if not the Liberals, four out of seven constitutes a majority.

I cannot confirm when decisions will be taken on the recommendations until we have considered the various representations received.

I must say to Opposition members that we are not committed to responding to all the recommendations at the same time because many of the recommendations of the STEAC report are not controversial. The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and the Doon Valley listed a number of questions about the future of colleges of education and particularly Craigie college. It was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame North (Mr. Corrie) during Scottish questions yesterday, and it is, of course, in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. I confirm to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley that, in considering Craigie, as with the other colleges, we shall take into account all the relevant factors and ensure that decisions are appropriate on educational grounds, which was the point made by the hon. Member for Garscadden, as well as cost-effective.

The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley emphasised most the point about numbers and surplus capacity. It is common ground that there is surplus capacity. In its report, STEAC said in paragraph 5.34:

"While we accept that there will be a growth in numbers in primary schools at least and that some reversal of the trend in student numbers in the colleges of education during the next decade will be required, we do not foresee the stage being reached again when all seven colleges of education will be filled to capacity with trainee teachers, teachers on in-service courses and students on other non-teacher-training courses."

Equally, it is recognised that some of the capacity figures that have been quoted in the past, and to which the hon. Gentleman referred, are less sophisticated than we would wish. I accept the general point that both hon. Members made that, in taking decisions on the need to effect rationalisation, it is important that we have information available to us that relates actual accommodation to the particular requirements of the current range of courses offered by the colleges. For that reason, my Department, in conjunction with the colleges is carrying out a computerised analysis of available accommodation and course requirements. The hon. Member for Garscadden referred to that.

Let me expand on that point. Over the past two months or so, my Department has met each of the colleges to discuss initial computer prints showing accommodation usage. The initial prints are a working tool only, but in the light of comments made they will be amended to show as realistically as possible the position in each college. The computer model will allow us to test the effect of future population changes. The results of that exercise will be available to inform our decisions on the STEAC report.

I agree with both hon. Members that it is important that decisions are reached on sensible educational grounds. STEAC took the view that there should be rationalisation of courses of secondary teacher training to avoid small numbers of students being spread too thinly over a wide range of specialist subjects. I confirm to the House that, pending the outcome of consultations on STEAC, it would be premature to contemplate radical changes. Therefore, rationalisation in connection with intakes for the session 1986-87 is being carried out without prejudice to the longer-term position.

Mr. Foulkes: The Minister referred to the computerised analysis of availability of accommodation and course requirements, but that does not take account of geographical factors. Scotland represents one third of the land area of the United Kingdom. I hope that at least if the computer does not take account of that, the Minister will.

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman took the very words out of my mouth. I was about to say that the up-to-date information on capacity and on the projections of student numbers is vital. I can confirm to the hon. Gentleman that the Government will of course take fully into account geographical and other factors, and the importance of in-service training to which both hon. Members referred.

No doubt the House or perhaps the Scottish Grand Committee will return to the subject when the Government have reached their decisions. For the moment, I confirm to the House that I shall study carefully and in detail the points that both hon. Members put to me during the debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Three o'clock pursuant to resolution of the House [25 March].

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Kurds

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what representations he has received about human rights in Iran and Iraq with particular reference to people in Kurdistan;

(2) what representations have been made to the Governments of (a) Iran and (b) Iraq about human rights in Kurdistan and about the treatment of Kurds.

Mr. Eggar: We are always concerned about allegations of human rights violations, including against minority groups, wherever they occur. We have received a number of representations from Amnesty International, and from individuals, about incidents in Kurdistan. We take every suitable opportunity to raise human rights matters with both Governments.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received from the United Nations High Commissioner for refugees about the standards of life of occupants of refugee camps for Kurdish people in Iran and Iraq.

Mr. Eggar: None.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Lindop Report

Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the Government have reached a decision on the recommendations of the Lindop report on academic validation of public sector higher education; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: When the report of the Lindop committee of inquiry was published in April 1985 the Government invited comments on its recommendations. The Government have now considered these recommendations in the light of comments received and have reached the following main conclusions.

The Government share the committee's view that the most effective safeguard of an institution's academic standards is the existence within it of a strong, cohesive and self-critical academic community. In future, the main purpose of external validating arrangements must be to foster the development of such communities.

The Government are not persuaded at present that to achieve their main purpose of maintaining and improving standards, certain polytechnics or colleges need to be granted full autonomy in validation with powers to award their own degrees, as the committee proposed in its option 3. Instead, the Government welcome the changes that the Council for National Academic Awards is now making in response to the work of the Lindop committee—along the lines of the committee's option 1. Institutions will be able to seek substantially greater responsibility for validation and review of their courses and, subject to amendment of the CNAA's charter, authority in certain cases to award degrees in their own names. The Government also welcome parallel proposals in respect of external validation by universities. The Government will watch how these developments progress before coming to a final decision on option 3.

Existing arrangements for validation have, rightly, been criticised for their bureaucracy and excessive reliance on course documentation and for insufficient attention to course delivery and outcomes. The Government welcome the CNAA's commitment to the simplification of its procedures and look to the council to modify its approach generally to meet such criticisms. They also expect institutions to co-operate fully in the adoption of a new approach to validation. Progress in this area on the part of both CNAA and institutions will bear on the Government's final decision on option 3. The Government do not anticipate that the new arrangements will on balance increase local authority expenditure and they could indeed permit some reduction.

A copy of a paper setting out in greater detail the Government's response to the Lindop report has today been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications were received in 1984 and 1985, respectively, from United Kingdom non-governmental organisations for 100 per cent. project support through the joint funding scheme for population and family planning projects; if he will specify each application received from each organisation showing if the application was refused; and if he will set out the reasons for refusal in each case.

Mr. Raison: The following applications were received in 1985 (none were received in 1984):

Agency	Project	Outcome
Population Services	Pilot project to promote family planning among the lower income workers and rural workers in Leon, Mexico	Accepted
Population Services	Integrated mother and child health and information education and training programme for Association of Women's Clubs in Zimbabwe	Refused—the design of the project was considered to be inappropriate to the family planning needs of Zimbabwe
Population Services	Youth fertility education programme, Sierra Leone	Accepted
Population Concern	Expansion of family planning services to the Terai region and Banke district of Nepal	Refused—the design of the project was considered to be inappropriate to the family planning needs of Nepal
Population Concern	Family welfare workers, training programme, Karachi, Pakistan	Under consideration—the grant has been sought for financial year 1986-87
Population Concern	Outreach family planning services, Kenya	Under consideration—the grant has been sought for financial year 1986-87

In addition a further four projects were funded in 1984 and 1985 although the applications for the grants were received in previous years.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Student Grants

Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number of undergraduate students in receipt of a local education authority maintenance grant (a) who have made an additional claim for travelling expenses and (b) who have received payment as a result of such a claim (i) in England and Wales and (ii) in Newcastle upon Tyne, in the most recent period for which figures are available.

Mr. Walden: Of the 178,377 mandatory award holders in England and Wales reimbursed for excess expenses incurred in respect of travel in 1983-84, 1,063 were from Newcastle upon Tyne. Figures for England and Wales are not yet available for 1984-85, but 44 award holders from Newcastle upon Tyne were reimbursed for excess travel expenses in that year. The Department does not collect separate figures in respect of claims and of reimbursements.

Teacher Training Institutions

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teacher training institutions have been closed down since 1981; and on how many of these there have been consultations with the National Advisory Body.

Mr. Walden: Intakes to courses of initial teacher training have ceased at 10 institutions since 1981. One of the 10 institutions has now closed. The National Advisory Body was given the opportunity to comment on those institutions which were within its area of responsibility at the time.

Physics Posts

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many physics posts are currently estimated to be vacant in secondary schools; and what proportion of these are in secondary schools in the Wolverhampton education authority area.

Mr. Chris Patten: Based on incomplete returns for January 1986 from local education authorities, it is estimated that there were about 140 unfilled vacancies for posts in maintained secondary schools in England for which physics was the main teaching subject required. Two vacancies in that subject were reported by Wolverhampton local education authority.

Teachers Superannuation Scheme

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take steps to amend the teachers' superannuation scheme to provide for equality of benefits and contributions for male and female teachers, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Men and women pay the same rate of contributions to the teachers' superannuation scheme and are treated in the same way with regard to benefits apart from those payable in the event of death. Although a death gratuity is payable in respect of all teachers, family benefits, subject to the completion of a minimum qualifying period, are payable automatically only on the death of a male teacher. Widowers' pensions are payable only if the teacher has earlier nominated her husband as being wholly or mainly dependent on her. My right hon. Friend accepts that there are strong arguments for equality of treatment in this as in all other features of the scheme, but there are cost implications.

The subject has been discussed in the teachers' superannuation working party, on which both teachers and the local authorities are represented. At the last meeting on 9 December 1985, the teachers' panel was informed that as a way forward my right hon. Friend was prepared to invite the Government Actuary to take automatic widowers' benefits into account when he calculates the contributions required at the next quinquennial review. I understand that the teachers' panel is currently considering this offer.

Music Teaching

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy towards the nature, scope and objectives of music teaching in (a) primary and (b) secondary education; what representations he has received about the level of resources available for music teaching in schools; if he has any plans to make additional resources available for this purpose; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Government believe that all pupils in our schools can derive fulfilment and enjoyment from the study and practice of music. Music education in both primary and secondary schools should provide first-hand musical experiences which challenge and absorb pupils across the whole range of musical ability, and give them all the opportunity to show what they know, understand and can do. It should also foster the development of those pupils who display particular musical talent. The discussion document "Music from 5 to 16", published by Her Majesty's inspectorate last year in its "Curriculum Matters" series, examined in detail the nature, scope and objectives of a music education based on these principles. Comments on that document are still being received.

My right hon. Friend has received representations from time to time both about the general quality of music education in schools and from individual parents about the provision available for their children. We believe that the level of funding should be adequate to give music a worthwhile place in both the primary and secondary curriculum. However, as I stated in my reply to the hon. Member on 13 November at column 175, responsibility for determining from within the resources available to them how much should be provided for music education in maintained schools rests with the local education authorities and schools themselves. My right hon. Friend has no present plans to make available additional resources specifically for music teaching in maintained schools, but the Government are currently providing aided places for over 300 gifted young musicians at four specialist music schools participating in the music and ballet scheme.

Burnham Committee

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will next review the representation on the teachers' panel of the Burnham primary and secondary committee.

Sir Keith Joseph: I do not think that it would be appropriate to consider holding such a review until the independent panel recently appointed by ACAS to assist management and teachers in negotiations on various matters, including procedures for negotiation, has completed its work. In the meantime I will continue to keep changes in membership of the teacher unions under careful observation.

Hearing-impaired Children

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what proportion of hearing-impaired children in (a) special schools and (b) hearing-impaired units continue with further education after the age of 16 years; and if he will give what information he has regarding the percentages taking up the various types of further education;

(2) how many local education authorities are charging the parents of hearing-impaired young people for board and lodging costs incurred because the young people have to stay away from home, because there are no suitable courses with support facilities locally;

(3) how many hearing-impaired young people are on further education courses; how many of these are on specialist residential courses; and what proportion are being charged for some or all of their board and lodging costs by the local education authority.

Mr. Chris Patten: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will request local education authorities to provide him with information on the extent and nature of the provision that is made to meet the special needs of hearing-impaired students at the further education colleges for which they are responsible;

(2) if he will take steps to maintain a central list of colleges and universities which make special provision for the particular needs of hearing-impaired students, including information on the availability of (i) radio hearing aids, (ii) note takers, (iii) additional tutorials, (iv) help with language from a teacher of the deaf, (v) full or part-time educational interpreting into sign language and (vi) courses especially for hearing-impaired students.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Department has commissioned a survey of the provision being made on 1 November 1985 for students with special educational needs in all maintained, assisted and grant-aided institutions of further and higher education. The survey report will offer a summary on a national basis of information about provision for the hearing-impaired under the headings suggested by the right hon. Member and I shall send him a copy when the report is available later in the year. The Department does not require for its own purposes to hold a record of information relating to individual colleges but such information should be obtainable from individual local education authorities. So far as the universities are concerned, I would refer the right hon. Member to the reply given to him by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science on 13 March at column 539.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about charging the parents of hearing-impaired children aged over 16 years for board and lodgings costs which arise because no appropriate further education opportunities are available within the county boundaries, and the children have to continue their education elsewhere; and what replies he has given.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend is currently considering complaints on this subject from the parents of six young people over the age of 16 with hearing impairment. Each case of this kind has to be considered individually in consultation with the authority concerned and my right hon. Friend, though he is aware of the need to resolve such cases as quickly as possible, is not yet in a position to offer replies to the parents.

National Deaf Children's Society (Appeal)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to reply to the appeal under section 68 of the Education Act 1944 made by the National Deaf Children's Society in July 1985.

Mr. Chris Patten: The National Deaf Children's Society wrote in support of three of the young people referred to in my earlier reply today to the right hon. Member. The Department's interim response on behalf of my right hon. Friend indicated that the eventual reply would in part depend upon the outcome of his consideration of the individual complaints. A reply will be sent as soon as possible.

"School Attendance and the Education Welfare Services"

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if the Scottish Federation of Education Welfare Officers was invited to make a submission prior to the issue of his Department's draft circular "School Attendance and the Education Welfare Services"; and what representations it made to him on the matter.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Department's consultations were restricted to the relevant English associations, since the circular does not apply to Scotland.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Visual Display Units

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visual display units are in use by (a) his Department and (b) the Metropolitan police; and how many of these are Tempest-shielded.

Mr. Hurd: There are about 1,000 visual display units in use in my Department at present. Precise figures for my Department and figures for the Metropolitan police can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

It is not the practice to make public details of security arrangements and I am not able to say what number of visual display units may be Tempest-shielded.

Prison Officers Association

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the General Secretary of the Prison Officers' Association; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend last met Mr. Evans, along with other trade union representatives, on 3 March to discuss the current review of prison industries.

Castington Young Offenders Institution (Overtime)

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what change he has made in the 1986-87 overtime budget for the Castington young offenders institution.

Mr. Mellor: The overtime budget for 1985-86 is £526,864. The 1986-87 overtime budget has been set at £515,612, reflecting the closer match between the authorised complement and the number of staff in post at Castington than obtains on average across the region.

Law and Order (Expenditure)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total of public expenditure on law and order in 1979 and 1985, respectively, as expressed in 1980 prices; and using the same base year, what is the estimated expenditure for each of the next three years.

Mr. Hurd: On the basis of 1980-81 prices, expenditure on law and order services in England and Wales was £2,473 million in 1979-80 and is estimated to be £3,258 million in 1985-86. Using the same basis of 1980-81 prices, planned expenditure for 1986-87 is £3,287 million. No decision has been taken on provision for 1987-88 and 1988-89. The cash figures provisionally included for those years in the Government's expenditure plans 1986-87 to 1988-89 will be reconsidered in this year's public expenditure survey in the light of local authority budgets for 1986-87 and other factors.

Data Protection Act 1984

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many businesses have registered under the Data Protection Act 1984 to date; and how many have yet to register.

Mr. Waddington: About 13,000 applications for registration have been received by the Data Protection Registrar. He estimates that about 300,000 data users and computer bureaux may be liable to register.

EC (Television Programmes)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the proposals from the Common Market Commission on the content of television programmes in EEC countries; and if he will explain the extent to which his Under-Secretary of State, Lord Glenarthur, has been involved in discussions on these issues with the Commission.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that the Commission is preparing a draft directive arising out of the proposals in its Green Paper on broadcasting of June 1984, but that no final decisions have yet been taken on its content. As indicated in paragraph 92 of the recent report from the House of Lords' Select Committee on the European Communities (HL43), it is believed that the Commission has been considering the possibility of quotas on certain types of programming. My right hon. Friend and I discussed the Green Paper proposals with the Commissioner responsible, Lord Cockfield, at a meeting on 14 February at which my noble Friend, the Under-Secretary of State, was also present.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the proposed directives on the content of television programmes in EEC countries will fall to be considered within the procedures which permit majority voting in the Council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It will be for the European Commission, in proposing a draft directive, to indicate the powers under which it might be made; and subsequently for the Council to decide which articles of the treaty would be appropriate.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why the EEC Commission wishes to restrict United States television programmes and substitute programmes from EEC countries.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I cannot answer for the Commission.

Prison Statistics

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have served prison sentences of less than one week at Winson Green prison, Birmingham, since 1 September 1985.

Mr. Mellor: According to the records held centrally, about 30 persons were initially received into Birmingham prison in the period 1 September 1985 to 31 January 1986 to serve sentences of less than one week.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is yet in a position to say how many staff in his Department will be working wholly or partly on functions arising out of the Local Government Act 1985 and the implementation of the abolition of the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council during the financial year 1986-87; what are the estimated costs for 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is still too soon to estimate staff time and costs in 1986-87.

Juries (Defendants' Antecedents)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to ensure that juries are advised of an accused person's previous convictions before they come to a verdict on all prosecutions involving allegations of violence and disorder; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We are looking further at current law and practice in the light of the case which my hon. Friend no doubt has in mind.

Illegal Immigration

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy in relation to the circumstances in which he orders the removal of people whose entry to the United Kingdom was subject to immigration control, who have been in the United Kingdom for 10 years or more but whose residence during that period has been lawful.

Mr. Waddington: Continuous lawful residence in the United Kingdom of 10 years or more is considered a prima facie reason for allowing a person to remain even though he or she does not qualify to do so under the general provisions of the immigration rules. However, each case is considered on its merits taking into account any countervailing factors such as a criminal record.

In considering possible deportation, my right hon. Friend has regard to the matters set out in paragraphs 156-159 of the immigration rules (HC 169).

Prisoners (Movements)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why the following prisoners have been moved (a) Joseph O'Connell from Parkhurst to Leicester, (b) Tommy Quigley from Wormwood Scrubs to Albany, (c) John McComb from Parkhurst to Long Lartin and (d) Eddie Butler from Leicester to Parkhurst.

Mr. Mellor: Mr. O'Connell, Mr. McComb and Mr. Butler were transferred for operational reasons. Mr. Quigley was returned to Albany from Wormwood Scrubs having been transferred temporarily in the interests of good order and discipline at Albany.

M1 (Policing)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the appropriate chief officer of police as to the level of policing of the M1 prior to the M25 exit generally and at peak times, and as to any changes in the level of policing planned at peak times in response to recent levels of congestion; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The policing of this section of the M1 is a matter for the chief constable of Hertfordshire. He has informed me that two patrol cars are allocated to the area, and additional resources are made available when necessary. It is expected that the current congestion problem will be considerably eased when the final section of the M25 is opened at the end of this year.

Entry Refusals

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were refused leave to enter the United Kingdom during 1985; and how many of those people originated from the New Commonwealth and Pakistan.

Mr. Waddington: The available information relates to those removed from the United Kingdom after being refused entry, who numbered 18,505 in 1985; of these, 10,334 were nationals of countries of the New Commonwealth or of Pakistan.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Islington, North of 16 January, Official Report, columns 623-5 concerning arrivals from Bangladesh, how many of those refused entry were (a) subsequently given temporary admission, (b) returned to Bangladesh and (c) returned to a third country;

(2) pursuant to his reply of 16 January, Official Report, columns 623-4, concerning persons denied entry, how many of those refused entry were (a) subsequently given temporary admission, (b) returned to their country of origin and (c) returned to a third country.

Mr. Waddington: I will reply as soon as possible.

Metropolitan Police (Complaints)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many complaints have been received from persons in respect of officers in the N division of the Metropolitan police for each month since June 1983; how many of the investigations have been completed; how many were found in favour of the complaint; how many have resulted in compensation; how much has been paid in compensation; and how many are still unresolved.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is not readily available and I will reply as soon as possible giving such information as can be obtained without undue expense.

Police (Firearms)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions since January 1984 firearms have been used (a) by police and (b) others in the N district of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Figures provided by the Commissioner are as follows:

Number of police operations in N district in which a police officer fired a weapon with which he had been issued:

1984	Nil
1985	1

Figures for incidents in N district in which firearms were used by persons other than police are not immediately available, and I will write to the hon. Member.

Stop and Search

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were stopped and searched in each month since January 1984 and subsequently (a) charged and (b) not charged for each of the sub-divisions of N district of the Metropolitan police area.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I will reply as soon as possible.

Metropolitan Police (N District)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, by incident, the number of persons in the N district area of the Metropolitan police who have been charged with conspiracy to pervert the course of justice and subsequently had the charge withdrawn.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that this information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what occasions CS gas containers, riot shields or water cannons have been issued to N district of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner that no CS gas containers or water cannon have been issued to N district. All districts in the Metropolitan police hold a small number of riot shields.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions since January 1984 police have been brought into N district from other divisions.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Between 1 January 1984 and 13 March this year, officers from other districts were deployed on N district on 72 occasions.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of occasions that firearms have been issued to police in N division by month since January 1984.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The available records show the number of police operations in which firearms were issued, rather than the number of separate occasions; and they are maintained on an annual basis and could not, without disproportionate expense, be shown on a monthly basis. The available information, provided by the Commissioner, is as follows:—

Police operations in N district in which firearms wre issued:—

1984	39
1985	32

Sri Lankan Nationals (Visa Requirement)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now remove the visa requirements for entry to the United Kingdom for Sri Lankan nationals.

Mr. Waddington: No.

News International Plant, Wapping (Meeting)

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the circumstances in which, on the evening of 12 March, a lorry at Wapping drove through a line of police into a meeting being held there by the hon. Member for Newham, North-East, the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney, (Mr. Shore), the hon. Members for Easington (Mr. Dormand) and for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott); what action the police are taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I regret that in this incident two demonstrators and two police officers suffered minor injuries. I am advised by the Commissioner that the police are investigating the incident, and have questioned the lorry driver concerned. No decision has yet been made on whether any charges should be brought.

Security (Grants)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there are any plans to introduce a system of grants to assist occupiers in areas of high crime to improve the security of their premises.

Mr. Giles Shaw: There are a number of local schemes run, for example, by local authorities or crime prevention panels, for supplying security devices free or at very low cost to those most in need, particularly the elderly. Central Government funds provided through the urban programme and the community programme may also be used in schemes to help make homes more secure. These seem the best ways of directing resources where the need is exceptional. It would be wrong to suggest that the state should take over from householders responsibility for looking after their homes.

Inner-City Crime

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department has any plans to carry out studies of crime levels in the inner city.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Police forces regularly collate, and publish in the chief constable's annual report, information on notifiable offences recorded in their police force area. Summary national figures are also published regularly (for example in "Notifiable Offences Recorded by the Police in England and Wales, 1985", Home Office Statistical Bulletin 4/86, published 13 March). Some information on inner-city crime can also be drawn from the British crime survey (see for example Home Office research studies Nos. 81 and 85.)

Emergency Headquarters, Dover

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply of 25 February, Official Report, column 486, what was the level of cost quoted for the refurbishment of the former sub-region emergency headquarters at Dover.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The cost of refurbishing this communication centre was estimated to be £500,000.

Civil Defence

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether in the arrangements for civil defence, sites have yet been selected for zone headquarters numbers 6.1, 8.1 and 10.1.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Sites have been selected for regional government headquarters 6.1 and 8.1 but not 10.1.

Iraqi and Iranian Nationals

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people from (a) Iraq and (b) Iran are currently in the United Kingdom, broken down into (i) refugees, (ii) asylum seekers and (iii) students.

Mr. Waddington: This information is not available. Statistics of those seeking asylum show that between 1979 and 1985 380 Iraqi nationals were granted asylum (with or without refugee status), and 300 were given leave to enter or remain on an exceptional basis following the refusal of asylum. During the same period, 4,630 Iranian nationals were granted asylum, and 2,040 were given exceptional leave. At 31 December 1985 there were about 400 applications for refugee status outstanding from Iraqis and about 1,500 from Iranians.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many Iraqi nationals who arrived in the United Kingdom via Iran have had their asylum application refused and are currently on temporary admission;

(2) how many persons from (a) Iran and (b) Iraq have been refused asylum and are currently in the United Kingdom on temporary admission.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that information in the form requested could not be obtained except at disproportionate cost.

Rape Victims (Anonymity)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to introduce legislation to protect the anonymity of victims of rape or attempted rape prior to charges being formally brought; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend is considering urgently whether, without making it harder to catch the offender, it would be possible to bring forward the time at which the anonymity of a victim of rape is protected by law.

Police (Assault)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and the chief constable of the West Midlands police as to the number of summonses which have been issued against officers of their forces for alleged assault on private citizens and the number of cases in which each force has been required to pay compensation to the plaintiff.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 13 February, c. 517]: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that for 1985 the information is as follows:

Civil actions against officers of the Metropolitan Police for assault (note 1) against members of the public, 1985

	Number	Payments made £
Actions initiated in 1985	63
Actions completed (notes 2 and 3) in 1985:
(a) By decisions of a court	4	3,255
(b) By settlement out of court	31	108,145

Notes

1. Assault was not necessarily the only cause of action.

2. The figures of actions completed do not include four cases settled in 1985 in which proceedings were not formally initiated against the Metropolitan Police because the force admitted liability. Payments made in these cases totalled £9,500.

3. Of the 35 Metropolitan Police cases completed in 1985, only five (all out of court settlements) were cases initiated in that year.

I understand from the chief constable of West Midlands police that eight such actions were initiated against officers of the force in 1985 but information about actions completed in that year is not readily available.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid Projects

59. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of United Kingdom aid funds through the European Economic Community is devoted to (a) population projects and (b) improvements in the economic position of women.

Mr. Raison: Figures are not available in the form requested, but the third Lomé convention provides for the first time that the appraisal of all European Community aid projects and programmes under it will take account of their impact on the status and role of women, and on the balance between demographic structure and other resources.

Overseas Students

60. Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many overseas students have been financed (a) by the Overseas Development Administration and (b) from other sources in his Department in each year 1979 to 1985 to study in Britain compared with the total number of overseas students studying in Britain in each of the same years.

Mr. Raison: The number of overseas students supported in the United Kingdom under overseas Development Administration and other Foreign and Commonwealth Office support schemes on 31 December 1979 was 8,449, compared with a total overseas student population of 87,800. The comparable estimated figures for 31 December 1985 were 9,192 and 55,500 respectively. The information is as follows:

Overseas students studying in Britain 1979-80 to 1985-86

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86

* Estimated.

Aid Expenditure

61. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his latest estimate of the total official overseas aid expenditure for 1985-86.

Mr. Raison: Funds available for aid expenditure in 1985-86 are £1,200 million. Actual expenditure is still subject to a number of uncertainties which affect the spending outturn on most of the items in the aid programme.

Aid (UN Target)

62. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government expect to achieve the United Nations' target of 0·7 per cent. of gross national product for overseas aid.

Mr. Raison: The Government remain committed to the principle of the UN target for aid, but progress towards it must depend on developments in our economy and other claims on resources. The recently announced increases for aid up to 1988-89 should more than maintain the real value of the programme.

Pest Control

63. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement concerning the current work in hand of the Tropical Development Research Institute in respect of pest control.

Mr. Raison: Approximately one third of TDRI staff work on pest control. The main targets are major agricultural crops afflicted with widespread and migratory pests; and important storage pests. The programme also extends to some carriers of human and animal diseases, such as tsetse flies and blackflies. Much of the effort relates to Africa, but there is a significant Asian element as well.

Nicaragua

64. Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the proposed loan by the Inter-American Development Bank to the private agricultural sector in Nicaragua.

Mr. Raison: The project is still under discussion between the bank and Nicaragua; a loan proposal has yet to be placed before the board.

Voluntary Agencies

65. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the level of support for the voluntary aid agencies in the forthcoming financial year.

Mr. Raison: Details of the level of direct support from the aid programme to the voluntary aid agencies for the coming financial year will be included in the supply estimates which will be published tomorrow, 18 March. In the 1985-86 estimates, provision for direct grants to the voluntary agencies amounts in total to £13·8 million.

Aid Programme

66. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied that the aid programme works sufficiently to the advantage of British industry.

Mr. Raison: British industry benefits substantially from the aid programme. Bilateral aid is generally tied to procurement in Britain and the value of multilateral aid contracts placed in Britain exceeds the value of our contributions to the agencies concerned. Over the last three years, the aid and trade provision has supported £1 billion of exports. By 1988-89, the new soft loan scheme is expected to enable us to double the amount of ATP-supported business annually.

Ethiopia

67. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of his Department regarding the use by the Ethiopian Government or by agencies operating in Ethiopia of United Kingdom overseas aid funds to support the Ethiopian Government's programme of internal deportations; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: We provide no support for the Ethiopian Government's current resettlement programme. Our aid to Ethiopia is carefully monitored, and we are satisfied it has not been used to promote resettlement.

Joint Funding Scheme

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what allocations have been made through the joint funding scheme for 1985 and 1986; which voluntary organisations have been given grants; and for what purposes.

Mr. Raison: A total of £4·8 million was allocated to the joint funding scheme for the financial year 1985-86. Grants have been made to the following agencies:

Action Aid
Aga Khan Foundation (UK)
Appropriate Health Resources and Technologies Action Group Ltd
Catholic Fund for Overseas Development
Catholic Institute for International Relations
Christian Aid
Commonwealth Society for the Deaf
Euro Action Accord
Feed the Minds
Friends of Jairos Jiri
Help the Aged
Interlink
International Voluntary Service
Leonard Cheshire Foundation
Leprosy Mission
National Childrens Homes
Ockenden Venture
OXFAM
Population Concern
Population Services
Royal Commonwealth Society for the Blind
Salvation Army
Save the Children Fund
Scottish Catholic International Aid Fund
SOS Children's Villages
SOS Sahel
Tear Fund
Water Aid
World University Service

World Vision of Britain
Young Mens Christian Association
Zimbabwe Trust

These grants have been provided to support over 700 long-term development projects in a large number of developing countries. The projects encompass a wide range of activities including the application of appropriate technology, improving local water supplies, developing more effective production and marketing techniques, improving farming methods, non-formal education, primary health care and family planning.

Westland Helicopters

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why moneys to subsidise the export of Westland helicopters to India are to be paid out of aid funds directly instead of under the aid and trade provision.

Mr. Raison: In November 1983 the Government of India requested aid from our regular bilateral programme to them for the purchase of 21 Westland W30 helicopters and I considered and agreed the request on this basis.

TRANSPORT

Stansted Airport

Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Transport why he has approved a safeguarded area at Stansted of 810 acreas when at the public inquiry the British Airports Authority asked for 500 acres to 570 acres.

Mr. Michael Spicer: At the airports inquiries, two options for the location of a possible second terminal at Stansted were considered. In option A, recommended by the inspector, the terminal would be located to the north-east of the approved development site. The inspector noted that this option was expected to require 270 hectares (667 acres). In considering the area to be safeguarded, I took into account the need for the area to encompass the realignment of public roads, not taken into account at the time of the inquiry, so as to minimise the impact on the woods in the area, notably Eastend wood, about which the inspector expressed concern.

A substantial part of this wood, which the BAA owns, lay outside the original boundary, as did about half of Little Newlands wood. The revised boundary which I have approved encompasses these woods and an area beyond them for the public roads to be reprovided. In other places it has been possible to reduce slightly the extent of the original boundary. The net result is that the area which is to be safeguarded is 327 hectares (about 810 acres).

London (Lorry Ban)

11. Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Transport what new information he has as to the effectiveness of the Greater London council lorry ban and, in particular, the number of exemption permits issued by the Greater London council.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Since the GLC had granted 20,000 permits and it appears refused none, information on effectiveness is difficult to come by. Londoners are benefiting from a 20 per cent. reduction in lorry movement as a result of the M25 bringing daytime as well as night-time benefits.

National Bus Company

12. Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the present timetable for the disposal of each of the National Bus Company subsidiaries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: The Transport Act 1985 requires the National Bus Company to dispose of all its operations by January 1989. The company will be advertising these for sale, and I hope that it can achieve substantial privatisation dufing this year, preferably by management or employee buy-outs of local subsidiaries.

20. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what impact he expects the sale of the National Bus Company to have on rural bus services.

Mr. David Mitchell: The sale of NBC will be in line with the Government's policy of promoting competition in the bus industry. I believe this will be of benefit to all bus services, including those in rural areas.

32. Mr. Dixon askd the Secretary of State for Transport, what changes to bus services he expects from the sale of the National Bus Company.

Mr. David Mitchell: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) on 6 March.

Trunk Roads

13. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied with present standards of trunk road maintenance.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are increasing funds for maintenance. In the present financial year we have renewed about 145 miles of all-purpose trunk road—45 miles more than we expected at the start of the year—and 70 miles of motorway. Next year we intend to renew about 185 miles of all-purpose trunk road and 80 miles of motorway. This is progress.

Transport Act 1985

14. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received any further representations about the operation of the Transport Act 1985.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received a number of such representations.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will meet representatives of the proposed passenger transport joint boards to discuss the likely impact of the Transport Act 1985.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have met representatives of some of the passenger transport joint boards, and stand ready to do so in future when there are matters of substance they wish to discuss.

Airports (Security)

15. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent action he has taken to provide for the security of travellers at airports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have given security a lot of attention in recent months. In particular, I attended the International Civil Aviation Organisation's council meeting in June last year, which resulted in a tightening up of the international security standards and recommendations in annex 17 to the Chicago convention; I have carried out a thorough review of United Kingdom aviation security measures; I have arranged for greater security to be provided for the El Al operation at Heathrow and Manchester airports; and I have taken steps to ensure that the new terminal at Stansted and the redeveloped terminal 3 at Heathrow will incorporate suitable security features.

Local Government Reform (Public Transport)

17. Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the quality of public transport in the metropolitan county areas.

Mr. Ridley: In recent months I have met the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and most of the new passenger transport authorities. I have also received a number of letters about public transport in the metropolitan county area.

19. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the operation of the public transport system in Greater Manchester following the abolition of the Greater Manchester council.

Mr. David Mitchell: I met the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority on 14 January and have received a number of letters from it and from others about public transport in the area.

Bus Services

18. Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Transport what changes he expects in the numbers of bus services in the evenings following the start of a deregulated bus service.

Mr. David Mitchell: Deregulation will encourage bus operators to respond more flexibly to passenger demand, but local authorities will still be able to subsidise particular services if there are gaps in the commercial provisions.

Heathrow and Gatwick (Scheduling Committees)

21. Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received about the future of the scheduling committees at Heathrow and Gatwick; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have recently received representations from several sources, including hon. Members of the House and a variety of civil aviation interests. For the most part they have paid credit to the efficient operation of the airport scheduling committees. I associate myself with that view.

DVLC, Swansea

22. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding the effectiveness of the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre at Swansea; and if he is satisfied with its efficiency.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I receive a regular variety of representations about the effectiveness of the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre. I am satisfied that it is currently providing a generally acceptable standard of service.

BREL, Crewe

23. Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will raise with him the future of the British Rail Engineering Ltd. foundry at Crewe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. The future of the foundry at Crewe is a management matter for British Rail Engineering Ltd.

Concessionary Fares

24. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied with London Regional Transport's implementation of Government policy on concessionary travel.

Mr. David Mitchell: Government policy is that arrangements for concessionary travel should remain as far as possible the responsibility of local authorities. In London, the boroughs have agreed on the continuation of the existing arrangements which LRT will be administering on their behalf.

31. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received following the publication of his concessionary fare regulations under the Transport Act 1985.

Mr. David Mitchell: We have received one such representation.

MOT Testers

25. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with the present arrangements for the licensing and relicensing of MOT testers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. The arrangements are to be reviewed. I expect to propose improvements to tester training later this year.

Channel Tunnel

16. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to publicise the implications for travellers of the construction of a Channel fixed link.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is for the Channel Tunnel Group-France-Manche as promoters of the scheme to publicise the implications for travellers.

CTG-FM has said it will provide an all-weather, no-booking shuttle service that will be significantly quicker than the existing ferry services across the Dover straits, as well as enabling through rail services to be operated by BR and SNCF.

40. Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has for the total value of investment in the United Kingdom which will result from the construction of the Channel fixed link.

46. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Transport what he estimates will be the employment and economic benefits of the Channel tunnel project for regions other than the south-east.

Mr. David Mitchell: The basic cost of the CTG-FM project is estimated by the promoters at £2·6 billion, including construction, materials and equipment, split between the UK and France. CTG-FM has said that orders for about £800 million-worth of materials and equipment will be required on the UK side, and that large numbers of firms, predominantly outside the south-east, will be well-placed to compete for contracts. To this should be added, expenditure of up to £210 million by BR on rolling stock. Taking into account that materials and equipment will constitute more than half the total investment, I expect that the majority of jobs generated directly by the construction of the fixed link will be outside the south-east.

In the longer term British industry as a whole will benefit in its ability to compete from the more efficient transport to and from the continent that the tunnel will provide, in the form of better access to the large continental markets.

42. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further progress has been made with the promoters on the programme for constructing a Channel tunnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr Ridley: The concession agreement between the United Kingdom Government, the French Government, the Channel Tunnel Group Limited and France-Manche SA was signed as of 14 March. It specifies that preliminary studies and preparatory works shall be carried out within three years of the agreement coming into force, breakthrough of the service tunnel will be made within seven years and construction will be completed within 10 years. The concessionaires' own timetable envisages the link coming into operation by 1993. Copies of the concession agreement will be placed in the Library.

43. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to publicise the provisions of the treaty that the construction of the Channel fixed link will require no public funds.

Mr. David Mitchell: We shall publish shortly the concession agreement with the two companies which confirms and amplifies the position on public funds.

Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to ensure access for ferry operators to facilities such as customs and immigration clearance and direct motorway and express rail links of a standard equivalent to those to be provided for the operators of the fixed Channel link; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My aim is to ensure that road connections to ferry ports are of an appropriate standard to meet expected levels of traffic. Investment on improved rail links will need to meet the usual criteria for BR investment. Any investment within ports, on improved immigration and customs facilities, is a matter for the port authorities after consultation with the Government Departments concerned in the light of the foreseeable level of usage.

LRT (Modernisation Investment)

26. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what investment he has approved by London Regional Transport for modernisation.

Mr. David Mitchell: The approved external finance limit for 1985-86 allows for LRT to spend £230 million on investment in renewing and modernising the system. My Department is contributing £193 million in grant towards that programme. In 1986-87 capital grants will be increased to £216 million to support a planned investment programme worth £261 million. Significant projects approved during 1985-86 include the purchase of 260 new buses, the introduction of an automatic ticketing system on the Underground, modernisation of Bank station and comprehensive renewal of the Underground's power supply.

Road Deaths

27. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether there has been any reduction in the figures for road deaths for the first three quarters of 1985, compared with the equivalent periods for previous years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The relevant figures are as follows:

Road deaths: January-September: 1981-1985: Great Britain

	Number
1981	4,235
1982	4,288
1983	3,912
1984	3,975
1985	*3,600

* Provisional

Road deaths for January-September 1985 were respectively 11 per cent. and 9 per cent. fewer than in the corresponding periods of 1984 and 1983. 1983 was the lowest year for road deaths since 1956.

British Rail (Catering)

28. Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Rail, he will raise with him the subject of the encouragement of more private sector catering trolley services on British Rail routes which lack buffet services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: We have asked the British Rail chairman to obtain more supply and support services from the private sector, including catering. I am pleased that private trolley services are now operating on several BR routes. I want to see them on many more. The BR board tells me it would welcome further proposals and I hope that private firms will come forward with them. In effect there is an open invitation to caterers to identify a train service where travellers provide a market and put a proposition to BR. It is also an invitation to travellers who want a service where one is not now provided to draw attention to the opportunity.

British Rail (Provincial Services)

29. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he next intends to meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss provincial services.

Mr. David Mitchell: Matters affecting provincial services are often raised when my right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of British Rail.

London Regional Transport

30. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he plans to further reduce the direct cost to the ratepayer of London Regional Transport.

Mr. David Mitchell: Government objectives given to LRT in 1984 set tough targets to reduce real unit costs progressively and hence the burden of revenue support on the ratepayers. LRT is meeting or bettering these targets. Ratepayers have already benefitted by a 1p in the pound reduction in their rates for 1986-87. We have approved higher levels of investment and given priority to cost-saving projects. So ratepayers face the welcome prospect of a continuing reduction in the cost of running London Regional Transport.

British Airways

33. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of British Airways, he will raise with him the planned sale of British Airways helicopter division; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport gave to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 21 February at column 384. There has been no change in the situation since then, and I see no need to raise the matter with the chairman of British Airways.

British Rail (Investment)

34. Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many, and what value, of the investment schemes submitted by British Rail to his Department for approval in the last two years have been approved and rejected, respectively.

Mr. David Mitchell: We have approved 11 schemes with a total value of £650 million and rejected none. Two schemes are still under consideration.

Road Contracts

35. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many major national road contracts have been completed (a) late and (b) early in the last year.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Thirty-six major national road contracts have been completed in 1985-86. All finished within the contract period, although in some cases extensions of time were granted to take account of factors, such as bad weather, outside the contractor's control. In terms of the original completion date, 19 contracts finished early and a further eight were on time.

Trolley Buses (Leeds and Bradford)

36. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with the West Yorkshire passenger transport authority concerning the possibility of Government grants for the reintroduction of trolley buses in the cities of Leeds and Bradford; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am currently considering an application from the West Yorkshire passenger transport executive for grant under section 56 of the Transport Act 1968 in respect of a proposed trolley bus system in Leeds.

Bus Lanes

37. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about bus lanes.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Various bodies and individuals, including hon. Members, raise points for or against bus lanes from time to time, including availability for other kinds of traffic. A number of recent representations have concerned schemes being pressed ahead by the GLC.

British Rail (Privatisation)

38. Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for Transport which services relating to the railway operations of British Rail, excluding hotels and land, have been privatised since 1979.

Mr. David Mitchell: The British Railways Board has privatised the ferry services formerly provided by Seaspeed and Sealink. It is also encouraging private firms to the tender for a range of products and services, competing with the board's in-house suppliers on fair and equal terms.

London (Minibuses)

39. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of London Regional Transport, he will raise with him the use by London Regional Transport of minibuses on London bus routes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I meet Dr. Bright regularly to discuss a wide range of topics. I see no reason to raise the question of minibuses with him at present.

Train Services (Disabled People)

41. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent discussions he has had with British Rail management regarding travelling conditions for disabled people needing to use train services.

Mr. David Mitchell: My officials meet British Rail frequently to discuss travelling conditions for disabled people. The latest occasion was at a meeting of the British Railways Board advisory group on transport for the disabled which was held on 5 March.

Cars (Child Restraints)

44. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps his Department takes to promote the use of restraints for children in cars.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department has incorporated the subject of restraints for children in cars in its current rolling programme of road safety advertising. During the last two weeks of March, a series of national newspaper advertisements will draw attention to the hazards of unsecured children in cars and to the advantages of using approved restraints.

Additionally, an illustrated and practical advisory leaflet is being updated and reissued. We are responding to the concern of one BBC television programme "That's Life". We are encouraging local community groups to promote awareness and action.

HGV (Test Fee)

45. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking on the level of the heavy goods vehicle driver test fee.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department has just reviewed the heavy goods vehicle and public service vehicle driver tests and fees. We shall be consulting on proposed changes shortly.

The changes we propose will alter the length of the tests and, in the interests of road safety all the exercises in the PSV test will be conducted off the road. The HGV driver test will be no less rigorous but shorter.

We propose to reduce the HGV fee from £65 to £40 and to increase the PSV fee, which has not changed since 1982, from £36 to £40. This should provide a net saving of some £1 million to candidates.

Motorways (Accidents)

47. Mr. Ottaway asked the Secretary of State for Transport which European Community country has the lowest rates for fatal accidents on motorways.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The most useful indicator compares motorway deaths to the amount of traffic: information is readily available for the following countries.

Car user deaths per 100 million vehicle-kilometres: Motorways: 1984

	Number
France	0·9
West Germany	0·8
Great Britain	0·5

More comprehensive information is available on death rates per 100 kilometres of motorway.

Road Casualties

48. Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will publish the 1985 road user casualty figures.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The next road casualty press notice, covering provisional figures for the fourth quarter and the whole of 1985, will be issued on 17 April.

Railways (Punctuality)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the relative performance of British Rail and other railway systems in the European Community on punctuality.

Mr. David Mitchell: None.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to the answer of 12 March, he will make a statement on the causes of the deterioration of punctuality of British Rail express services; and if he will publish in the Official Report the figures on which the answer was based.

Mr. David Mitchell: Those are management matters for the British Railways Board.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to the answer of 12 March, he will provide a breakdown by region of British Rail's punctuality for both express and non-express services.

Mr. David Mitchell: I do not yet have this information for the period covered in the answer of 12 March.

UK-Canada Air Services

Mr. Thornton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what were the results of the recent bilateral negotiations held between the United Kingdom and Canada on air services, between the two countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The UK-Canada air services negotiations held in London in late January were initiated by the UK with a view to replacing the existing 1949 air services agreement with new arrangements more responsive to market requirements. Useful progress was made, and it is expected that the negotiations will be resumed shortly.

M3 (Bar End-Chilworth)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to be able to make his determination upon the public inquiry into the last section of the M3 motorway from Bar End to Chilworth.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The inspector's report is still expected. I do not expect to be able to make an announcement before the late summer.

Severe Weather Damage

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his preliminary estimate of the amount of damage done to the roads, the railways, the ports and the airports of the United Kingdom as a result of the current year's exceptionally cold weather.

Mr. Ridley: No reports of exceptional damage to roads have so far been received. However, their general condition is monitored regularly and the results are taken into account in determining the provision of funds for maintenance. It is for the appropriate operator to assess any damage caused to railways, ports and airports. I am not aware of exceptional problems.

Coach Routes

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to control the routes taken by coaches operating for hire and reward; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Local authorities already have powers under the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 to restrict the routes taken through their areas by vehicles of any type, including coaches and other passenger-carrying vehicles. As with all aspects of traffic regulation, we shall keep an eye on the matter.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is yet in a position to say how many staff in his Department will be working wholly or partly on functions arising out of the Local Government Act 1985 and the implementation of the abolition of the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council during the financial year 1986-87; what are the estimated costs for 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: At present I have nothing further to add to the reply to the hon. Member given by my right hon. Friend on 21 January at column 142.

M1-M25 (Lane Markings)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will arrange for lane markings on the M1 on the approaches to the M25 relating to the laning of traffic passing through the junction to begin sufficiently far from the junction that at peak times and current levels of congestion traffic has sufficient warning of the junction arrangements to enter the correct lane before reaching the stretch likely to be congested; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The problem at junction 6 between M1 and A405 will largely disappear when the M1/M25 interchange is opened in the autumn.

I am grateful for my hon. Friend's suggestion. Arrangements are being made to provide temporary carriageway markings and appropriate road signs on the southbound carriageway of M1 approaching junction 6.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, further to the reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth, he will take immediate steps to ensure that traffic can move more quickly from the M1 to the M25.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Traffic signals have already been erected at the junctions of A405 with M1 and with M25 to and from the west. A dedicated lane has also been provided to permit traffic from the M1 southbound exit slip road to filter on to A405. These measures have made congestion less severe than it would otherwise have been. Physical constraints make it impossible to do much more in the comparatively short time before the M1-M25 interchange is opened.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will investigate the possibility of using the hard shoulder of the M1 as an additional lane for traffic leaving the motorway to join the M25.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The hard shoulder adjacent to the southbound carriageway of the M1 immediately north of junction 6 narrows considerably at the A405 overbridge, at the point where the southbound exit slip road begins. This constraint makes it impracticable to use the hard shoulder as a running lane.

A11 (Accidents)

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report details of the fatal and personal injury accidents which occurred in each of the years between 1979 and 1985 on the section of the A11 west of the B1106 junction to the edge of Elveden parish, west of the Elveden memorial.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I will write to my hon. Friend.

Civil Defence

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what joint plans have been agreed by the Government for the services of British Rail, including its workers and rolling stock, to be made available in the United Kingdom to support foreign military forces involved in the reinforcement of Europe if this became necessary during grave national tension;

(2) what joint plans have been agreed by the Government for the services of transport workers to be made available in the United Kingdom to support foreign military forces involved in the reinforcement of Europe if this became necessary during grave national tension;

(3) what joint plans have been agreed by the Government for workers in the civil aviation, ports or shipping industries to be made available in the United Kingdom to support foreign military forces involved in the reinforcement of Europe if this became necessary during grave national tension.

Mr. Ridley: An arrangement between the United States and the United Kingdom permits the United States to establish, operate and maintain lines of communication and anciliary facilities in the United Kingdom for use under emergency conditions as part of their NATO obligations, with the proviso that United Kingdom Government's requirements take priority. Detailed planning in support of this arrangement is classified.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what joint plans have been agreed by the Government for civil aviation facilities, including airports and aircraft to be made available in the United Kingdom to support foreign military forces involved in the reinforcement of Europe if this became necessary during grave national tension.

Mr. Ridley: An arrangement between the United States and the United Kingdom permits the United States Forces to establish, operate and maintain lines of communication and ancillary facilities in the United Kingdom for use under emergency conditions as part of their NATO obligations. As part of this arrangement the United Kingdom has agreed to consider requests for such facilities with the proviso that the United Kingdom Government always has priority in using national resources. Details of the plans in support of this arrangement are classified.

ENERGY

Coal (Productivity)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give coal industry productivity figures, showing the overall output per manshift and the output per manshift on the coal face for each month since April 1985.

Mr. David Hunt: NCB average overall revenue and production output per manshift in each month since April 1985 was as follows:

	Overall revenue tonnes	Production tonnes
4 weeks ending 27 April 1985	2·11	9·64
5 weeks ending 1 June 1985	2·37	10·87
4 weeks ending 29 June 1985	2·56	11·29
5 weeks ending 3 August 1985	2·47	11·39
4 weeks ending 31 August 1985	2·55	11·15
4 weeks ending 28 September 1985	2·76	11·75
5 weeks ending 2 November 1985	2·85	12·32

5 weeks ending 1 February 1986*	2·83	12·61
4 weeks ending 1 March 1986	3·06	13·35

* Affected by Christmas and New Year holidays.

Coal Industry (Manpower Statistics)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many miners have left the coal industry since April 1985 up to the end of February 1986; and what are the present figures for numbers employed giving surface and underground figures separately.

Mr. David Hunt: Between 30 March 1985 and 1 March 1986 there was a reduction of 31,637, to 139,742, in the number of men on colliery books. Of this latter figure 114,679 were employed in underground grades.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the latest figures for workers in the coal mining industry in each of the coalfields, and giving the number of pits still working and specifying those which are profitable and unprofitable at the present time.

Mr. David Hunt: As at 1 March 1986 the numbers of men on colliery books and producing collieries in each NCB Area were as follows:

	Men on Books	Collieries
Scotland	7,735	9
North East	17,952	11
North Yorkshire	20,270	22
South Yorkshire	18,082	19
North Derbyshire	9,344	9
Nottinghamshire	26,723	22
South Midlands	9,358	10
Kent	1,450	3
Western	15,354	13
South Wales	13,474	17
TOTAL	139,742	135

Many pits are making considerable progress with measures to improve profitability but these cannot usefully be assessed over a short period.

Coal-exporting Countries

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will list the countries that are exporting coal to Great Britain, giving the annual tonnages over each of the past five years;

(2) what information he has as to which countries are dumping coal in western Europe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Imports of coal into the United Kingdom have been as follows:

Civil Defence

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what joint plans have been agreed by the Government for services of workers in the energy supply or distribution industries to be made available in the United Kingdom to support foreign military forces involved in the reinforcement of Europe if this became necessary during grave national tension;

(2) what joint plans have been agreed by the Government for supplies of petroleum oil and lubricants to be made available in the United Kingdom to support foreign military forces involved in the reinforcement of Europe if this became necessary during grave national tension.

Mr Peter Walker: Such plans have been laid under a US-UK lines of communication arrangement which stems from the NATO obligations of the US, but with UK requirements taking priority. Details of planning in support of this arrangement are classified.

Petroleum Production

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the Government's latest forecasts of the level of United Kingdom petroleum production.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The latest forecasts for United Kingdom petroleum production in the years 1986 to 1990 are as follows:

	Million tonnes
1986	120-135
1987	110-130
1988	100-125
1989	90-120
1990	85-115

As in previous years, these forecasts represent a range of levels of possible petroleum production for each year. The ranges make allowance for the considerable technical and geological uncertainties which influence the rate of oil production from both mature and recently developed fields.

The figures comprise stabilised crude oil and natural gas liquids. Production of the latter has built up rapidly in the last few years as follows:

	Million tonnes of NGLs
1981	1·5
1982	2·9
1983	4·1
1984	4·7
1985	*5·1

* Provisional.

NGLs are expected to account for some 5 million tonnes annually of total petroleum production to 1990. Total production in 1985 of stabilised crude and NGLs is estimated to have been 127·5 million tonnes.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Ministry of Agriculture (Employees' Leave)

Mr. Budgen asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will withdraw the Ministry of Agriculture (N.I.) circular AEC 15/86, which prohibits annual leave or flexi-leave where employees are thought to intend to spend all or part of it in political activities.

Dr. Boyson: No; this circular was simply a reminder to staff of their existing responsibilities.

Anglo-Irish Agreement (Legal Sub-group)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what are the functions of the judicial sub-committee set up at January's Anglo-Irish meeting;

(2) when the judicial sub-committee set up at January's Anglo-Irish meeting will meet; if its findings will be made public; and if it will take submissions from outside public bodies;

(3) who are the members of the judicial sub-committee set up at January's Anglo-Irish meeting.

Mr. Scott: The legal sub-group met on 13 February. Copies of the joint statement issued after the meeting have been placed in the Library.

Proscribed Organisations (Membership)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons charged with offences relating to membership of (a) the Irish Republican Army, (b) the Irish National Liberation Army, (c) the Ulster Volunteer Force, (d) the Ulster Defence Association and (e) any other proscribed organisation, have been granted bail since 1979.

Mr. Scott: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons charged with offences relating to membership of (a) the Irish Republican Army, (b) the Irish National Liberation Army, (c) the Ulster Volunteer Force, (d) the Ulster Defence Association and (e) any other proscribed organisation, have been convicted on the basis of uncorroborated evidence over the last four years.

Mr. Scott: Courts make their decisions having regard to all the admissible evidence placed before them. It is not possible to identify cases in which the eventual decision might have depended only on uncorroborated evidence.

Evidence

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if United Kingdom representatives attending the judicial sub-committee set up at January's Anglo-Irish meeting will raise the subject of the use of uncorroborated evidence in no-jury courts; if he has any information as to whether representatives from the Republic of Ireland will seek to raise this subject; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The legal sub-group of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference met on 13 February. A copy has been placed in the Library.

At the meeting of the legal sub-group of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference on 13 February, Ministers authorised further work by officials on matters of mutual concern, including the search for measures to enhance public confidence in the administration of justice. This work is still in hand.

War Emergency Headquarters

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what arrangements have been made for the provision of war emergency headquarters in Northern Ireland by local authorities.

Mr. Scott: With the assistance of the district councils, the Government plan to create 26 district civil defence centres by designating existing buildings and adapting them where necessary.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what arrangements have been made for the provision of protected war emergency headquarters in Northern Ireland by Government Departments in the region.

Mr. Scott: Government Departments in Northern Ireland have made arrangements to co-ordinate essential civil services in war emergencies using selected existing buildings. The Government have announced that the effectiveness of these arrangements will be enhanced by the construction of three purpose-built protected centres in the region. This is scheduled to begin in 1987 and to be completed during 1989.

WALES

Health and Social Services

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing separately for (i) hospital and community health services, (ii) family practitioner services and (iii) social services, actual and planned expenditure in Wales for the years 1978-79 to 1988-89 in (a) cash prices, (b) cost terms and (c) volume terms, and showing the percentage increases over 1978-79, on a basis consistent with table 2.12 of Cmnd. 9702-II.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The following tables contain the information requested. Since expenditure is given net of patient charges in table 2·12 of Cmnd 9702-II, the expenditure figures ae given on a net basis. Actual expenditure figures may differ from planned as a result of transfers between revenue and capital expenditure. The expenditure figures also exclude current and capital expenditure on central health and miscellaneous services.

Ministerial Appointments

Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has delegated to other Ministers in his Department the power to make, on his behalf, appointments to any public bodies in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: In relation to appointments for which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is the appointing Minister, it is the practice for some invitations to individuals to serve on public bodies to be issued on his behalf by another Departmental Minister.

Public Bodies (Appointees)

Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) why he does not keep records of any political affiliation of appointees to public bodies in Wales; and if he will make a statement;

(2) to what extent in selecting appointees to public bodies in Wales, he takes account of any political affiliations of the candidates; whether the extent to which account is taken of these varies according to the appointment concerned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: In making appointments to public bodies, it is our policy to select the best person for the job bearing in mind all factors relevant to the post. It is not the practice for our Department to keep records of appointees' party political affiliations; in some cases an individual's political affiliations may be known, but more often they are not.

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the percentage change in total gross expenditure, current and capital, on the National Health Service for each year since 1975 deflated by (a) real terms, (b) the retail price index and (c) movement in National Health Service pay and prices.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information requested is as follows:

	*In real terms	Deflated by the Retail Price Index†	Deflated by Movements in NHS pay and Prices‡
1975-76 to 1976-77	−0·5	−2·7	−1·4
1976-77 to 1977-78	−0·7	−0·7	+4·2
1977-78 to 1978-79	+3·6	+5·8	+4·6
1978-79 to 1979-80	+0·4	+1·3	−2·6
1979-80 to 1980-81	+8·4	+10·6	+0·6
1980-81 to 1981-82	+3·6	+2·3	+5·4
1981-82 to 1982-83	+2·9	+2·9	+3·4
1982-83 to 1983-84	+1·7	+1·5	+1·1
1983-84 to 1984-85	+3·4	+2·8	+2·1

* Actual expenditure has been adjusted to take account of the effects of general inflation as measured by the GDP deflator.
† As NHS expenditure deflated by the R.P.I. has been specifically requested, the information has been presented in this way. It is, however, not correct to compare movements in expenditure in NHS with movements in the R.P.I. since the goods and services purchased by the NHS differ considerably from those purchased by the average household. The appropriate measure to reflect movements in NHS expenditure with the economy as a whole is the GDP deflator.
‡ The pay and prices index used is that maintained by DHSS for hospital and community health services expenditure. A separate index for pay and price movements in the NHS in Wales is not available.

GCSE

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give an assurance that in introduing the new examination courses for the general certificate of secondary education his Department will not discriminate against those pupils receiving their education in Welsh or bilingual secondary schools.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Opportunities for training in preparation for GCSE are being provided by the WJEC, with Government support, for all teachers likely to be involved in the new courses irrespective of the medium of instruction.

Coal Industry (Job Losses)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the total figure for job losses in the coal industry in Wales in each year since 1975.

Mr. Mark Robinson: A total figure for job losses in the coal industry in each year since 1975 is not available. The National Coal Board give the following figures for manpower on colliery books at Welsh pits:

End of March	Thousand men
1975	33·1
1976	31·8
1977	31·2
1978	30·0
1979	28·6

1981	26·5
1982	25·5
1983	23·9
1984	21·3
1985	20·5
1986*	14·6

* 8 March.

Equivalent figures for employment at private mines are not available.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total of the job losses in (a) the south Wales coalfield and (b) the north Wales coalfield since 1955.

Mr. Mark Robinson: A total figure for job losses since 1955 is not available. The National Coal Board give the following figures for manpower on colliery books:

	South Wales coalfield	North Wales coalfield
Average manpower on colliery books 1955	101,300	10,000
Manpower on colliery books as at 8 March 1986	13,400	1,200

Health Education Advisory Committee for Wales

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the chairmanship of the Health Education Advisory Committee for Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I have received recently the resignation of Mr. Norman Whitehouse as chairman of the Committee and consequently as the Welsh representative on the Health Education Council, on his appointment as secretary to the British Dental Association. Mr. Whitehouse has had a most successful tenure as chairman of the committee and I wish him well in his new post. I am pleased to announce that Dr. Simon Small, senior lecturer in general practice at the University of Wales college of medicine, has accepted my invitation to become chairman of the advisory committee with effect from 1 April 1986. He has served on the Health Education Council since 1980 and is already an active member of the advisory committee.

SCOTLAND

Health and Social Services

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing separately for (i) hospital and community health services, (ii) family practitioner services and (iii) social work, actual and planned expenditure in Scotland for the years 1978-79 to 1988-89 in (a) cash prices, (b) cost terms and (c) volume terms, and showing the percentage increases over 1978-79, on a basis consistent with Table 2.12 of Cmnd. 9702-II.

Mr. Rifkind: The information requested is set out in the following tables.

Notes:

1. The expenditure figures are on a net basis comparable with those given in table 2·12 of Cmnd. 9702–II.
2. Expenditure on Centrally Financed Health Services is not included.
3. Figures in specific pay and price terms have been constructed by reference to the pay and price indices for Health and Personal Social Services maintained by DHSS for England: no separate pay and prices indices for Scotland are available.
4. Forecasts of pay and price movements for health and personal social services are not available for 1985-86, nor for the public expenditure planning period.

Sporting Premises

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total amount taken in rates on sporting premises region by region in Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: The information requested is not held centrally.

Radioactive Discharges

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, pursuant to his reply of 6 March, Official Report, columns 249-50, he will list the annual quantity of authorised discharges of uranium and other radioactive materials for each of the sites referred to since 1980.

Mr. Ancram: Details of the amounts of radioactive wastes discharged from these sites are not held centrally. Authorisations issued under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 specify the amounts of radioactive wastes which may be discharged. I am arranging for copies of the relevant authorisations to be placed in the Library of the House.

Tourism

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is being done to give practical effect to his proposal for changes in the planning control of tourist signposting.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend is considering the responses which have been received to the consultation paper on deemed consent for directional advertising signs for tourist attractions, which was issued by the Scottish Development Department last December.

Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has made any study of the operation of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 with particular reference to the way in which its licensing provisions have been implemented; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The central research unit of the Scottish Office has carried out a survey of licensing under the 1982 Act, and its report will be published later this year. The report will provide a basis for consulting the various interests concerned, as part of a review which my right hon. and learned Friend is putting in hand of the operation of the licensing provisions of the Act.

Rates

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the level of domestic rate relief in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

Financial year	Pence in the pound of rateable value p	Equivalent in domestic element of rate support grant £ million
1976-77	27	42·2
1977-78	31	49·7

Note: The significant changes in the level of domestic rate relief in 1978-79 and 1985-86 reflect the effects of rating revaluation held in those years.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average unrebated domestic rates bill in the year 1984-85 and in each of the previous 12 years.

Mr. Ancram: Estimated average domestic rate bills for Scotland (including water rates) are shown in the table below:

Local authority financial year	£
1972-73 (May-May)	66
1973-74	71
1974-75	83
1975-76 (May-March)	*108
1976-77 (April-March)	123
1977-78	139
1978-79	132
1979-80	149
1980-81	199
1981-82	272
1982-83	310
1983-84	310
1984-85	328

* 10½ months.

Since 1976, these figures have been contained in the publication "Rating Review" regularly issued by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy. Copies are available in the Library.

Mr. Gordon Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what statistics he has to show the level of (a) domestic rates, (b) commercial rates and (c) industrial rates for comparative properties in (i) Scotland and (ii) England when they are expressed as a proportion of capital value.

Mr. Ancram: The basis of valuation for rating is the annual rent a property might be expected to fetch rather than its capital value. Details of capital values of properties are not held centrally. The Government's proposals set out in "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714) envisage that domestic rates should be abolished while non-domestic rateable values should continue to be based upon evidence of rental values.

North of Scotland College of Agriculture

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will make it his policy to ensure the maintenance of an autonomous North of Scotland college of agriculture;

(2) what approaches have been made by officials of his Department to the North of Scotland college of agriculture regarding a possible merger; what plans he has to alter its present status; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: As indicated in my answer of 14 March to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) my right hon. and learned Friend supports the proposal by the Council of the Scottish Agricultural Colleges to form a new company which would have overall responsibility for the management of all the services provided by the Scottish agricultural colleges. Any alteration in the status and constitution of a college — north, west or east — requires the agreement of the board of governors of that college. Officials of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland have kept in close touch with all three colleges since the proposal was first made.

Rowntree-Mackintosh Plant, Edinburgh

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to whether any company has agreed to take over and run Rowntree-Mackintosh's Edinburgh plant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 18 February 1986, c. 128]: I understand that the management consultants commissioned by the company have investigated the possibility of finding a manufacturer to continue operating the present factory with its existing work force. After a number of approaches, both in the United Kingdom and other countries, they have concluded that there is no reasonable prospect of finding such an employer. The company has made it clear that the factory and the site could be used for the continuing benefit of the employees and the community. Various suggestions have been made and it may take the company some time to form a judgment on the merits of these proposals.

DEFENCE

Research and Development (Security Classification)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has consulted companies or organisations to be visited by Mr. Paul Hopler or Mr. Clarence Robinson of the Pentagon; and if he has explained to those bodies what powers Mr. Hopler has.

Mr. Norman Lamont: There have been no formal consultations with any of the companies to which visits were planned.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what approaches he has had from the United States Government with a view to imposing security classifications on United Kingdom research and development not connected with his Department's defence contracts.

Mr. Norman Lamont: None.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has given Mr. Paul Hopler and Mr. Clarence Robinson of the Pentagon permission to classify United Kingdom research and development.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his reply of 6 March, if intermediate level nuclear waste will be treated at the Atomic Weapons Research Establishment, Aldermaston; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Yes. Intermediate level radioactive wastes arise at the Atomic Weapons Research Establishment, Aldermaston from its nuclear programmes. Up to 1982 most of such wastes were disposed of to sea but now they are stored pending a decision on their ultimate disposal.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Defence if Her Majesty's Government have reached any agreement with the United States Government about the funding by Her Majesty's Government of some strategic defence initiative contracts awarded to Government establishments or to companies bidding for or engaged on strategic defence initiative work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Her Majesty's Government will not participate in the funding of SDI research contracts placed in the United Kingdom by the United States.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any officials from his Department's strategic defence initiative participation office attended the recent conference on the strategic defence initiative organised by Causa UK.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No.

Defence Programme

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the individual components of the defence programme will not meet their targets on cost and delivery.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to paragraph 503 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985" (Cmnd. 9430) which explains the nature of the forward defence programme and the continuing process of adjustment to it. For these reasons, and because of the complexity of the programme, it is not possible to provide the informaion which is requested.

TAVR

Sir Philip Goodhart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of volunteers serving with the Territorial Army Volunteer Reserve have had some previous service with the regular forces.

Mr. Lee: There are currently 982 officers of the Territorial Army who have had previous service with the regular forces. This represents 14·5 per cent. of the officer strength at 31 January 1986. The corresponding figure for soldiers is 15,301 (21·8 per cent.).

Live Animals (Experimentation)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to change the conduct of experiments using live animals in his Department's establishments in the light of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Bill [Lords] now before Parliament.

Mr. Lee: Experiments involving live animals are carried out only where the purpose of the work is of real importance and where the most careful consideration of alternatives has demonstrated that none is an adequate substitute. Experiments are conducted in as humane a way as possible and precautions are, and will continue to be, taken to prevent or reduce to the minimum consistent with the authorised procedures any pain, distress or discomfort to the animals. If on any occasion an animal is found to be undergoing excessive suffering it is at once painlessly killed. These considerations will continue to apply. It is the intention of this Department to comply fully with the proposed legislation, as it does with the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876.

War Emergency Headquarters (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements have been made for the provision of protected war emergency headquarters in Northern Ireland by the armed forces in the region.

Mr. Stanley: It is not our practice to disclose information on plans for operational military facilities, the publication of which would not be in the public interest.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Devon and Cornwall (EC Aid)

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will indicate for the years 1976 to 1985 the total amount of aid granted for projects in Devon and Cornwall separately by the European Community under the heading agriculture guidance fund.

Mr. Jopling: Aid granted from the EAGGF guidance section for projects under regulations 17/64 and 355/77 for the improvement of marketing and processing, and for projects under regulations 1852/78, 31/83 and 2908/83 for the restructuring of the fishing industry, in Devon and Cornwall was as follows:

£ million

	Devon	Cornwall
1976	0·017	0·181
1977	0·237	0·048
1978	0·368	0·156
1979	0·116	—
1980	0·499	—
1981	—	0·297
1982	0·062	0·079
1983	0·500	0·133
1984	0·290	0·147
1985	0·558	0·359

Mr. Coombs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will consider introducing regulations to impose maximum amounts of individual additives in food products in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gummer: The Food Advisory Committee keeps the use of additives under review. The committee is currently considering a review of the colouring matter in food and one of the issues which it is addressing is whether there should be maximum permitted levels.

Mr. Coombs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will arrange for a list of all the flavours currently used in the United Kingdom food supply to be placed in the Library, showing naturally derived, nature identical and synthetic flavours separately.

Mr. Gummer: No such list is available but we are participating in discussions in the European Community, one purpose of which is to enable the European Commission to prepare a list of food flavours used in the Community. In 1981 the Council of Europe published a list of "Flavouring Substances and Natural Sources of Flavourings" (ISBN 2-7160-0081-6).

Badgers

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what requests he has received from Branscombe, Devon, for assistance with the control of badgers following their attack on a young man there earlier in the current year; what response he has made; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: Problems with badger damage at Branscombe, Devon, were first drawn to the attention of my Department in July 1983. Local officials have provided advice on suitable damage prevention and deterrent measures on a number of occasions since then and a senior wildlife biologist met local councillors on 27 January to provide further detailed advice should damage recur in the spring. No evidence of attacks on humans was produced and I believe that accidental collision is an alternative explanation of any such report.

Details of the arrangements for the issue of licences to control badgers causing serious economic damage were explained to councillors but to date no licence applications have been received. Detailed advice has been offered to individual local residents experiencing difficulties.

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will suspend the trapping of badgers suspected of carrying bovine tuberculosis pending the publication of the Dunnet report.

Mrs. Fenner: No. Any reconsideration of my Department's policy for dealing with badgers infected with bovine tuberculosis in areas where they constitute a threat to cattle must await the conclusions of Professor Dunnet's review team.

Dr. David Clark asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he now expects to receive the Dunnet report on badgers' bovine tuberculosis.

Mrs. Fenner: I expect to receive the report shortly.

European Community (Food Sales)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, pursuant to the reply of 10 March, Official Report, column 357, he will publish in the Official Report, the basic features of the proposal presented by the Commission to the management committee on 28 February.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Civil Defence

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what joint plans have been agreed by the Government for the services of workers in the food production or distribution industries or in agriculture or fishing to be made available in the United Kingdom to support foreign military forces involved in the reinforcement of Europe if this became necessary during grave national tension;

(2) what joint plans have been agreed by the Government for supplies of food, fish or agricultural produce to be made available in the United Kingdom to support foreign military forces involved in the reinforcement of Europe if this became necessary during grave national tension.

Mrs. Fenner: An arrangement between the United States and the United Kingdom permits the United States to establish, operate and maintain lines of communication and ancillary facilities in the United Kingdom for use under emergency conditions as part of their NATO obligations with the proviso that United Kingdom requirements take priority.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Dining Facilities (Bookings)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the names of the sponsoring Member of Parliament or Members of Parliament who have made advance bookings of dining facilities in the Members' Dining Room, the Harcourt Grill Room, the Terrace Marquee and Rooms A, B, C and D, for the month commencing 17 March.

Mr. Biffen: It is not the practice of the Refreshment Department to make public the names of hon. Members sponsoring private functions in the Dining Room and other banqueting facilities.

Mail

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal how many post boxes are cleared by the staff of the House of Commons Post Offices; if he will give separately the numbers (a) within the Palace of Westminster, (b) within the precincts of the House of Commons and (c) within outbuildings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: The number of post boxes cleared by the House of Commons Post Office staff is 28 and these are all situated within the Palace of Westminster. Within the House of Commons the number of boxes cleared is 21. The House of Commons Post Office staff clear no post boxes within the outbuildings of the House of Commons.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will arrange for all mail posted in parliamentary outbuildings used by the House of Commons to receive a House of Commons postmark; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I am advised that it is not practicable for mail posted in the parliamentary outbuildings to be brought into the House of Commons in order to receive a House of Commons postmark.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal how many items of mail were handled (a) inwards and (b) outwards by the House of Commons Post Office; and what information he has as to the amount of mail originating in parliamentary outbuildings used by the House of Commons taken direct to other offices in London SW, in each of the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Biffen: (a) Approximately 5 million items of inward mail are delivered to the House of Commons annually and are handled by the House of Commons Post Office.

(b) Approximately 3·5 million outward items, all posted within the Palace of Westminster, are handled by the House of Commons Post Office annually.

(c) Approximately 2 million items of outward mail in the Palace outbuildings are cleared direct to the south-west mechanised letter office at Nine Elms annually. Figures for each of the last three years could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Futures Markets (United States Taxpayers)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has made to the United States of America against its discriminatory taxation of gains made by United States taxpayers on British futures markets.

Mr. Howard: Following written representations in June 1985, I pressed this matter with the United States Treasury when I visited Washington in November. I shall continue to urge on all concerned in the United States that the discrimination is incompatible with a commitment to fair competition within a free market structure.

Visual Display Units

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what date his Department was first notified of the specific security risk created by electromagnetic radiation from visual display units and arising from the specific interception and analytical methods described in the report mentioned in his answer to the hon. Member for Hammersmith of 10 February, Official Report, column 356.

Mr. Butcher: The potential security risk created by electromagnetic radiation from visual display and other units has been known and accepted for many years. In 1980 and 1981 an enhanced programme to extend protection was proposed and approved. This is being implemented where appropriate.

Grants

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all specific type grants paid by his Department to local authorities, showing the size of each grant, which were hypothecated to any individual service or services, or where local authorities had to bid for specific grants.

Mr. Butcher: Grants are not paid by my Department to local authorities for them to carry out any specific services. Local authorities are eligible to apply for support under the business improvement services scheme but details of grants actually paid are not readily available.

RTM 322-01 Helicopter Engine

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he anticipates the RTM 322-01 helicopter engine currently under joint development with Rolls-Royce and Turbomeca will be tested in the commercial version of the Sikorsky Black Hawk helicopter.

Mr. Butcher: This is a matter for Rolls-Royce; but I understand that the company expects to start testing in June or July this year.

Obscene Telephone Calls

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to establish safeguards to prevent subscribers to the telephone network making calls to numbers abroad which carry sexually explicit or obscene messages.

Mr. Butcher: No. I understand that it would not be technically feasible to bar subscribers' access to individual overseas telephone numbers. I am writing to my hon. Friend.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration has been given by his Department to the potential impact on the Alvey programme and other commercial programmes in information technology of the diversion of resources to strategic defence initiative contracts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: When research is at the fundamental and basic stage, there may well be some overlap between civil and defence technologies. This is in the nature of generic advanced technology; but it does mean that there are civil benefits from defence research and development. The Government recognise the need to maintain a balance between resources deployed to civil research and those deployed to defence work—of which strategic defence research is one component. However, it is still very early in the strategic defence programme and the Government is keeping the situation identified by my hon. Friend under close review.

Businesses (Insurance)

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to provide direct assistance to businesses in the inner cities by subsidising insurance premiums down to the rates that equivalent businesses would expect to pay elsewhere in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No.

United States Re-export Licences

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department is continuing to assist in the procurement of United States re-export licences for United Kingdom exports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The United Kingdom Government object as a matter of principle to United States extra-territorial claims to jurisdiction over certain re-exports from the United Kingdom and this Department will continue to give whatever assistance is appropriate to United Kingdom firms whose legitimate trading is affected by such claims.

Liquidations (West Midlands)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many firms in (a) the west midlands and (b) the black country area of the west midlands have gone into liquidation since May 1979; and what was the percentage change over the seven years prior to May 1979 in the two areas, respectively.

Mr. Howard: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Sexual Offences (Private Prosecutions)

52. Mr. Dickens asked the Attorney-General if he will make it his policy to take over any private prosecutions initiated for sexual offences against children if the police have at first decided not to prosecute on the grounds that the only prosecution witness would be the child concerned.

The Attorney-General: The policy of the Director of Public Prosecutions with regard to taking over private prosecutions is set out in the answer given by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), on 28 October 1985 at column 297. The Director will not take over and continue any prosecution unless he is satisfied as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the charge preferred.

Legal Aid

53. Mr. Maclennan asked the Attorney-General what recent representations he has received about the remuneration of barristers and solicitors for legal aid work.

The Attorney-General: The responsibility for remuneration of barristers and solicitors for legal aid work lies with the Lord Chancellor. He and I have received a number of representations on this subject.

Civil Court Cases (Wales and Chester)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General what factors are causing delays in the hearing of cases in civil courts on the Wales and Chester circuits.

The Attorney-General: I am not aware of any special factors causing delays on the Wales and Chester circuit as a whole. If the hon. Member has a particular case or court in mind I would ask him to draw it to the attention of my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor so that inquiries can be made.

News International, Wapping

Mr. Leighton asked the Attorney-General (1) if he will institute proceedings for dangerous driving against the driver of the lorry, registration number 677 XPG, who, on the evening of 12 March at Wapping drove through a line of police into the audience of a public meeting causing injuries; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if the Director of Public Prosecutions will request a police report into offences arising from the circumstances in which, at Wapping on the evening of 12 March, a lorry was driven through a line of police and into a meeting being held there by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and the hon. Members for Newham, North East (Mr. Leighton), for Easington and for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott); and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I understand that the Metropolitan police are making inquiries into the incident to which the hon. Member refers. It is for the police to decide whether to prosecute the driver involved in the incident. They may seek advice either from the Metropolitan police solicitors department or the Director of Public Prosecutions, but the director will not be requiring the police to submit a report to him. I am not aware of any circumstances which require my intervention in this matter.

Alleged Sexual Offences (Private Prosecutions)

Mr. Dickens asked the Attorney-General if he will now prosecute Dr. Raymond Colin Birt in respect of sexual offences involving an eight-year-old girl in Chelmsford.

The Attorney-General: No. The file prepared by the Essex police was first considered by the county prosecuting solicitor who, having had the benefit of counsel, advised the chief constable that the evidence was insufficient to justify the institution of criminal proceedings. Following an expression of intent by the mother of the child concerned to institute a private prosecution, the county prosecuting solicitor sought a second opinion from the Director of Public Prosecutions. He was also of the view that the evidence was insufficient and I agree with him.

Sexual Offences (Prosecution Policy)

Mr. Dickens asked the Attorney-General what is his policy on the prosecution of cases involving sexual offences when the victim is a child and no other witness is available to give evidence, although other corroborating evidence is available.

The Attorney-General: My guidelines as to the criteria for prosecution require the Director of Public Prosecutions to consider first whether the evidence is sufficient to afford a reasonable prospect of conviction; if he is so satisfied, he will then consider whether in the particular case the public interest requires the institution of criminal proceedings.

The first of these questions requires that he takes account of the factors referred to by the hon. Member.

A requirement of corroboration may arise in one of three ways. First, there are certain classes of offence (including offences under sections 2, 3 and 4 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956) for which corroboration is required by statute; secondly, section 38 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1938 (which renders admissible the unsworn evidence of a child of tender years) imposes an identical requirement whatever the nature of the alleged offence; thirdly, there is a rule of practice at common law requiring that juries be warned that it is dangerous to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of witnesses who fall into certain categories—one of which is children even where the evidence is sworn. In each case the test applicable to determine the nature and extent of the corroboration required is the same.

The Court of Appeal has held that to constitute corroboration evidence

"must be independent testimony which affects the accused by connecting or tending to connect him with the crime. In other words, it must be evidence which implicates him, that is, which confirms in some material particular not only the evidence that the crime has been committed but also that the defendant committed it."

Where the Director is satisfied as to the sufficiency of the evidence he will, in assessing the public interest, ordinarily take a serious view of offences involving sexual assaults on children.

Mr. Dickens asked the Attorney-General how many cases the Director of Public Prosecutions has considered in each of the last five years of allegations of sexual offences against children; and in how many such cases he has decided not to prosecute on the grounds that no prosecution witness would be available other than the child concerned.

The Attorney-General: The Departmental records maintained by the Director do not include the reasons for decisions to prosecute or not to prosecute in respect of any class of case. The information sought by the hon. Member could be obtained only by individual scrutiny of every file dealt with by the Director of Public Prosecutions during the relevant period which included an allegation of a sexual offence against a child. In view of the number of such files this exercise would result in disproportionate expense for the taxpayer.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Departmental Policies

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the objectives of his Department's policies for the rest of this Parliament.

Mr. Fowler: Considerable developments and improvements have already taken place in the fields of social security, health and personal social services during the lifetime of this Parliament. The Government are committing over 35 per cent. more in real terms to spending on social security in 1985-86 than in 1978-79, and we are seeking to ensure that those extra resources are used to the best advantage of beneficiaries. My right hon. Friend, the Prime Minister, recently made reference to some of the major achievements of my Department in her reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) on 24 February at columns 400-404. Our present plans seek to build on those achievements.

Legislation is now before the House to give effect to the major proposals for improving the social security system, put forward in the White Paper "Reform of Social Security: Programme for Action". The main objectives of the Bill are to give new rights and new opportunities in pension provision and to enable many more people to build up their own pensions; to ensure that more help is directed where it is most needed, in particular for low income families with children both in work and out of work, to improve incentives by substantially reducing the unemployment trap and eliminating the worst effects of the poverty trap; and to create a simpler social security structure that is easier for staff to administer and for the public to understand. Hand in hand with these reforms, which will be phased in during 1987 and 1988, we are building a more modern framework for delivering benefits with one of the most ambitious computer strategies ever undertaken in this country. In 1988 three major computer projects will begin the start of a transformation in the delivery of social security services both for staff and the public.

In addition, the Government remain committed to maintaining the real value of the basic state retirement pension. We have also started a major new survey to secure more comprehensive and up-to-date information about the numbers, circumstances and needs of disabled people. The full results of the survey are expected to be published in 1988, and will provide the evidence needed for a review of provision for sick and disabled people.

We expect to see continued development in the all round performance of the health service which in 1984 succeeded in treating more patients than ever before in history. All regional and district health authorities have appointed general managers; we intend that they should concentrate on securing the highest quantity and quality of patient care from resources available. Spending on the service is already at a record real level, and is set to increase still further over the next three years to a total of £17 billion in 1988-89 in England alone. Capital investment levels in the National Health Service estate will be maintained and modernisation of the building stock will continue. We are currently committing over £1,000 million to 147 major hospital projects under planning, design or construction. High priority will be given to the rationalisation of the estate, with consequent benefits of reduced running costs and increased income from land sales which will be used for the improvement of services to patients.

The Government will introduce legislation shortly to remove Crown immunity from hospital catering by making health authorities subject to the provisions of the Food Act 1984.

Priority is being given to the improvement of renal services and to improving cervical cancer screening programmes. Controlling the spread of acquired immune deficiency syndrome is also a major objective. We will continue to emphasise the need for improvements in the general health of the population, and to promote debate on and improvements in the field of primary health care. We expect to publish a consultation document on this important topic shortly.

We will continue with our campaign of education and information on drug misuse and with the improvement of treatment and rehabilitation services.

Turning to the personal social services, an important challenge is the need to develop community care services for people whose needs can be met outside hospital, and also to support their families and others who care for them. We shall continue to encourage local authorities to improve the management, allocation and delivery of the services they provide, and to assist voluntary organisations to extend the range and enhance the quality of their contributions. We shall be developing, with health and local authorities, systems of joint planning, vital to the successful growth of community care.

The efforts of local authorities to secure more effective use of the resources available for the personal social services are being assisted by my Department's social services inspectorate. The inspectorate's work programme, agreed annually with the local authority associations, includes the inspection of home help services, community services for mentally ill people, and social services for the care of children at risk of abuse. We are giving priority to the issue of guidance to help local authorities with the problem of child abuse, and undertaking a major review of child care law.

Departmental Office, Bloomsbury

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many items of outstanding post are awaiting action at the Bloomsbury local Department of Health and Social Security office, Tavistock square; and how long, on average, they have been outstanding.

Mr. Major: On 11 March 1986, there were 2,443 items of unlinked post outstanding of which 2,198 were over two days old. Only 33 of the total number of outstanding items were new or repeat claims to supplementary benefit. Records are not kept of how long, on average, items of post are outstanding.

Imported Medicines (Recall Procedure)

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the efficacy to date of recall procedures for parallel imported medicines dispensed in the United Kingdom in the event of a product problem arising.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am not aware of any recall of a parallel imported medicinal product, therefore there is no basis on which to provide the assessment sought.

If it is found necessary to recall a product it is the responsibility of the licence holder to arrange this and the records kept by product licence holders and wholesale dealers' licence holders must be adequate for this purpose.

Deficiencies in those records could lead to the suspension or revocation of wholesale dealers' or product licences.

Irradiated Food

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action will be taken against the Imperial Group of companies or its subsidiaries over the importation of irradiated prawns into Britain in April 1985; and what action he will take to prevent further importing of irradiated foods.

Mr. Whitney: Responsibility for enforcement of the Food (Control of Irradiation) Regulations 1967 as amended, which prohibit the importation and marketing of irradiated foods intended for sale for human consumption, is vested in port health and local authorities. Dover port health authority may be the relevant authority in this case and is investigating the allegation made. The extent to which controls are needed on the importation of irradiated foods will be reviewed by Ministers in the light of the "Report on the Safety and Wholesomeness of Irradiated Foods", which is to be published soon, and of the comments received on it.

Park Lane Hospital

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if there are any limitations on the number of rehabilitative days out for patients detained at Park lane hospital; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he has any plans to increase the level of resources available for rehabilitation at Park lane hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Visits outside the hospital for purposes of rehabilitation, either with a group of other patients or individually, are matters for decision by the responsible medical officer, in consultation with other members of the clinical team. At Park lane hospital, outside visits by patients subject to restriction orders who have the Home Secretary's approval for absence from the hospital, are subject to the overall control of the hospital's leave of absence committee, which takes account of clinical and security considerations and any other relevant matters.

As with all other aspects of the hospital's work, arrangements for outside visits, which frequently require escorting staff, must be made within the total volume of resources allocated to the hospital. We have ensured that Park lane hospital is well provided with resources. No increases are planned for this specific purpose.

Supplementary Benefit

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in Dulwich are on supplementary benefit.

Mr. Major: Dulwich is covered, for social security purposes, by four offices of the Department but their boundaries are not conterminous with those of the constituency. The table shows the number of people receiving supplementary benefit on 11 February 1986—the latest figures available—from each of those offices.

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were (a) the total numbers of single payments and (b) the total amounts paid under the supplementary benefit regulations for each social security office in Scotland in 1985.

Mr. Major: I regret that no information is available about the total amount of supplementary benefit paid out by individual local offices. Such information could be obtained only by a special exercise which would be disproportionately expensive. Tables showing the numbers of single payments awarded, and the amounts paid out, by each of the Department's local offices during the year ended 9 April 1985 are in the Library.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people of working age in (a) the west midlands and (b) the Walsall area are now receiving supplementary benefit; what were the figures in May 1979; and if he will give the percentage change in the two areas, respectively.

Mr. Major: The table shows the number of people of working age in (a) the west midlands and (b) the Walsall area who were receiving supplementary benefit at 11 February 1986—the latest available figures—and 15 May 1979; and the percentage change in the two areas:

	15 May 1979	11 February 1986	Percentage change
West Midlands	126,331	371,683	194
Walsall area	6,381	20,744	225

Medicines

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many medicines outside the selected list of drugs have had their prices lowered to fall beneath the prescription charge, since the list was enacted.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not readily available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

AIDS

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimates have been made by his Department as to the increase in the number of cases of people suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome during the next three years; and what total costs have been incurred by the National Health Service in treating patients suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome since 1982.

Mr. Hayhoe: For estimates of the increase in the number of cases of people suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) on 13 January at column 494. I regret that the cost information requested is not available centrally.

Claimants (Entitlement)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of cases relating to his Department's assessments of claiments' entitlements which have been brought to the attention of the Ombudsman in each year since 1979.

Mr. Major: An individual's entitlement to benefit is determined by independent adjudicating authorities whose decisions are not within the remit of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration.

The number of complaints of maladministration which related to Social Security matters and which were accepted for investigation by the PCA in the years 1979-1985, were as follows:

Number of complaints in respect of	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
Supplementary Benefits administration	20	30	55	50	27	42	44
Other Social Security Benefit matters	55	54	34	38	21	21	37
Total	75	84	89	88	48	63	81

Hospitals (Support Facilities)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many bills have been submitted by local authorities to his Department in each year since 1979 for social services support facilities to hospitals; what these bills amounted to each year during the same period; and if he will give a breakdown of the kinds of services each local authority claimed to have provided.

Mr. Whitney: Since the 1974 reorganisation of the National Health Service, local authorities have supplied the services of social workers to hospitals free of charge, in line with the recommendations of the working party on collaboration. In the same way health authorities supply certain services to local authorities without payment. No bills for hospital social workers have therefore been received. One local authority has however recently written to my right hon. Friend seeking his agreement, under Section 28(4) of the National Health Service Act 1977, to begin charging four health authorities for the services of hospital social workers.

The matter is under consideration.

London Ambulance Service

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the average daily number of patients, since 1 January, who have had hospital treatment cancelled on the advice of the chief ambulance officer of the London ambulance service, or his divisional ambulance officers, because of the non-availability of ambulances;

(2) how many patients had hospital treatment cancelled on Monday 10 February because of the non-availability of ambulances;

(3) what is the impact on the provision of ambulance services in London for patients requiring urgent treatment of the provision of ambulances for patients receiving non-emergency treatment at day hospitals; and what relative priorities are accorded to these two categories of ambulance journey.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks as it is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the South-West Thames regional health authority, which manages the London Ambulance Service on behalf of the Thames regions, for this information.

Overseas Pensioners

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the countries with which Britain has agreements to provide cost of living increases to British pensioners who reside there.

Mr. Major: Pensions are payable at the same rates as in the United Kingdom to pensioners in European Community States, and under reciprocal agreements to pensioners in the following countries:

Austria	Malta
Cyprus	Mauritius
Finland	Sark
Iceland	Switzerland
Israel	Turkey
Jersey	Yugoslavia
Guernsey

Pensioners in a further group of countries receive the increases which become payable after the date an agreement entered into force:

Bermuda, from 1 November 1969
Jamaica, from 1 October 1972
United States of America, from 25 September 1969

Wandsworth Health Authority (Nurse Accommodation)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many properties owned by the Wandsworth health authority are let to nurses working in the authority area.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish therefore to contact the chairman of the Wandsworth health authority for this information.

Old Persons (Heating)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what standard room temperatures have been recommended by his Department for old people in each season each year since 1979.

Mr. Whitney: The Department's design guidance for newly built local authority residential homes for elderly people issued in 1973 advised that space heating requirements should be calculated on the basis that a temperature of 70 deg. F (21 deg. C) should be maintained during the day in residents' sitting rooms and bed sitting rooms when the outside temperature is 30 deg. F (1 deg. C). Apart from this, there are no recommendations by the Department on standard room temperatures. Our view now is that individual requirements and preferences vary markedly and it would not be possible to specify a particular temperature that would be appropriate in all circumstances.

Health Authorities

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now announce details of the appointment and reappointment of chairmen of district health authorities from 1 April.

Mr. Hayhoe: District health authorities were established in 1982 as part of the reorganisation of the health service. Chairmen of these authorities were appointed for a four-year term. Following a number of vacancies in the interim, the terms of office of 170 chairmen expire on 31 March 1986.

In considering appointments and reappointments an important aim has been to bring in younger people as chairmen and to build on the improvements that have been made in the NHS in recent years, by appointing individuals with good management experience.

The process of considering the appointments has now been completed. 108 of the present chairmen are being reappointed. Of those chairmen who are retiring, a half are aged 65 or over, while a third resigned or indicated they did not wish to be reconsidered. The average age of the new chairmen now being appointed is 54—compared with 62, the average age of retiring chairmen. 18 of the new chairmen are already members of regional or district health authorities.

On this occasion some chairmen are being offered a two-year appointment instead of four to ensure that in future the reappointment exercise is phased. There is no significance between a two or four year term and all chairmen will be eligible for four year appointments in 1988.

Chairmen play a vital part in providing leadership to health authorities and in translating national policies into local action. My right hon. Friend and I are very grateful to all of them for their hard work and dedication over the past four years. I have placed a list of the new chairmen and their terms of office in the Library.

Sick Pay

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of successful appeals against refusal to pay statutory sick pay in each year from 1983 to 1985; and how many appeals against refusal to pay statutory sick pay were received by his Department in each year from 1983 to 1985 for the county of Leicestershire and the city of Leicester, respectively.

Mr. Major: Information about appeals to social security appeal tribunals on statutory sick pay questions was first collected from 1 April 1984. The information collected does not indicate whether the appellant is an employee or employer and figures are not available for localities smaller than a social security region. The available information is shown in the table.

Appeals to social security appeal tribunals on statutory sick pay question

Year	Number of appeals lodged*	Number of appeals heard and decided	Number of appeals decided in appellant's favour
1984 (April to December)	73	51	13
1985 (January to March)	25	10	5

A special count in the four local offices in the city of Leicester indicates that in 1984 only one appeal on a statutory sick pay question was lodged and in 1985 three appeals were lodged although only one was heard and decided in that year.

* Appeals lodged will include those lodged in the period plus those outstanding from an earlier period.

Health Care (Hampstead)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the expenditure on primary health care in the Hampstead health authority in the last three years; and what has been the average for district health authorities in England over the same period.

Mr. Hayhoe: Following are the figures requested:

*Expenditure on primary health care

	1982-83		1983-84		1984-85
	Total	Per head of population	Total	Per head of population	Total	Per head of population
	£ million	£	£ million	£	£ million	£
Hampstead health authority	9·0	85	9·8	93	10·7	101
Average for district health authorities in England		71		76		83

* Current expenditure on community health services plus net expenditure on family practitioner services. The latter expenditure cannot strictly be attributed to particular districts but has been included (pro-rata to population) from the annual accounts of the family practitioner committees which account for it.

Departmental Staffing Levels

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the level of staffing and speed of response to public inquiries at his Department's office in Melton street, London NW1.

Mr. Major: A further 5,000 staff for DHSS local offices was announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services on 7 March 1986. This very substantial increase, of which the Melton street office will receive an appropriate share, will ensure adequate levels of service throughout the coming financial year.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer of 7 March, Official Report, column 322, how many of the extra local office staff referred to will be added to those already employed at the Melton street office NW1, and the Cricklewood office, NW2 of his Department.

Mr. Major: The method of distributing the extra local office staff has still to be decided. It is not possible at this stage to say how many extra staff individual local offices will receive.

Nurses' Accommodation

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has yet received any proposals from Leeds western district health authority to close the nurses' home at Chapel Allerton hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Leeds western's proposals, which are currently under consideration in the Department, envisage a substantial reduction in the number of units of accommodation provided in the district, but do not specify which are to be closed to achieve this reduction. The authority has been asked to send the hon. Member details.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what criteria he applies when deciding to approve the sale of National Health Service property currently used as accommodation for nurses.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on 12 March at columns 526-27.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will take steps to include generic soluble paracetamol on the restricted list of drugs available on National Health Service prescription; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if, where a general practitioner prescribes a generic soluble paracetamol, the chemist is entitled to a reimbursement from National Health Service funds;

(3) if he will ask the review committee on the limited list to consider a generic soluble paracetamol for inclusion in the limited list; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what considerations have guided him in deciding which soluble paracetamol preparations (a) are and (b) are not included within the selected list of drugs prescribed at National Health expense.

Mr. Hayhoe: Since the introduction of the selected list scheme, two strengths of liquid paracetamol have remained prescribable by generic name and reimbursable on the National Health Service: Paracetamol Elixir Paediatric 120mg/5ml and Paracetamol Mixture 250mg/5ml. The advisory committee on National Health Service drugs, which gives independent expert advice on the preparations which should be available on NHS prescription, has reviewed liquid paracetamol preparations and endorsed the retention of the two drugs mentioned above.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much has so far been paid out for the current winter arising from the authorisation of the exceptionally severe weather payments in some areas.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 24 February at column 470.

Pensioners

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioners there are now and how many there were in 1979.

Mr. Major: In November 1979 there were 8·6 million retirement pensioners in Great Britain. By September 1985, the latest figures available, this figure had risen to 9·2 million.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the total number of deaths resulting in whole or in part from drug abuse for each London borough for each year in which figures are available since the boroughs were created.

Mr. Whitney: The tables show the number of deaths from drug addiction (International Classification of Diseases (ICD) 7th revision 323, 8th and 9th revision 304) for usual residents of each London borough for 1965 to 1984, and the number of deaths from non-dependent abuse of drugs (excluding alcohol and tobacco) ICD (9) 305·2 to 305·9 (figures for which are not separately identifiable prior to 1979) for 1979 to 1984.

Hospitals (Essex)

Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will publish in the Official Report the date on which he expects the formal consultation procedure on the closure of South Ockendon hospital to commence and to be completed;

(2) how many patients from South Ockendon hospital have been transferred to private residential homes or to board and lodging houses since 1984;

(3) what arrangements have been made for the supervision of patients transferred from South Ockendon hospital into private residential homes or into board and lodging houses since 1984; and if he will make a statement;

(4) how many urgent transfers of maternity cases from Orsett hospital to Basildon hospital have taken place in each year since 1982; and how this compares with the national average.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the district health authority for the information she requires.

Residential Care

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the recommendations which bear on his responsibilities put forward in the National Council for Voluntary Organisations report "Crisis in Residential Care", a copy of which has been forwarded to him.

Mr. Newton: I expect to meet representatives from the National Council of Voluntary Organisations on 19 March to discuss the recommendations made in their report. The relevant recommendations and any further representations they may make will be considered in the context of the current review of the supplementary benefits limits for people in residential care and nursing homes, and will also be taken into account by the working party with the local authority associations announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) on 28 January at column 501.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the limits on assistance towards living costs payable to people in private board and lodgings by his Department; and what are the limits on allowances payable to elderly and disabled people for private residential or nursing care.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to schedule 1 of the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions (No. 2) Regulations 1985 (SI 1985 No. 1835) for the maximum supplementary benefit amounts payable to people in residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels, and to the HMSO publication "Supplementary Benefit Maximum Amounts, Initial Periods and Board and Lodging Areas", a copy of which is in the Library, for information relating to ordinary board and lodging accommodation. The limits for ordinary board and lodging and hostels can be extended by up to £17·30 in certain individual cases, for example where a claimant is elderly or physically or mentally infirm.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies are conducted by his Department of rates which private landlords and owners of residential homes charge for young claimants of supplementary benefits and elderly people, respectively.

Mr. Newton: A study by management consultants on costs and charges in residential care and nursing homes is expected to be completed later in the spring. Longer-term research covering this area is being undertaken by academic units at the Universities of York and Kent. As part of the current review of limits, the Department is also looking at charges for all types of boarder accommodation.

Unemployment Benefit and Pensions

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the latest information available on the percentage of gross average earnings, unemployment benefit and the basic state pension each represents in the United Kingdom; and how this compares to each of the other members of the European Economic Community and the Scandinavian countries.

Mr. Major: The basic rates of retirement pension and unemployment benefit for a married couple introduced in November 1985 were at that date 36 per cent. and 29 per cent. respectively of the average weekly gross earnings of adult male manual workers in Great Britain. Information on the level of benefit in other countries is given in the Department's publications "Tables of Social Benefit Systems in the Member States of the European Communities" and "Comparative Tables of the Social Security Systems in Council of Europe member states not belonging to the European Communities", available in the Library. Information is not available for reliable comparisons with gross average earnings in the relevant countries.

Health Care and Social Security

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will list the latest figures for the amount of social protection (health care and social security) expenditure as a percentage of the gross domestic product in the United Kingdom and other members of the European Economic Community, on the same basis as his reply of 19 November 1984 to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) Official Report, column 63.

Mr. Major: Using the definition of "social protection" described in the "European system of integrated social protection statistics: Methodology — Part I" (Eurostat, 1981), which includes employers' sick pay and private pension schemes, social protection expenditure as a percentage of gross domestic product in 1982 was as follows:

	Per cent.
Netherlands	33·3
Belgium	30·5
Denmark	30·3
Federal Republic of Germany	29·8
Luxembourg	28·9
France	28·5
Irish Republic	23·9
United Kingdom	23·6
Greece	19·0

Information for other members of the European Community and for later years is not yet available.

Low Income Families

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy to update in the Official Report the information on the income level of poorer households provided in his reply of 24 October 1983 to the hon. Member for Dundee West (Mr. Wilson) Official Report, column 51, as soon as the 1983 low income families tables are placed in the Library.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have the information as soon as the tables are placed in the Library.

Dewsbury DHA

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he is satisfied with the discharge of its functions by the Dewsbury district health authority;

(2) for what reasons the services of Mr. Sam Lyles as chairman of the Dewsbury district health authority are being terminated.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the annual gross revenue from National Health Service prescription charges in the calendar year 1985.

Mr. Hayhoe: The income from prescription charges collected in 1985 for drugs dispensed by the family practitioner services, in England, is estimated to be £130 million. Information in respect of prescription charges collected in the health and community health services is not available centrally in respect of 1985.

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the total annual administration costs associated with prescription charges during the calendar year 1985.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not available.

General Hospital Birkenhead (Sale)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will detail the price gained from the sale of the general hospital site in Birkenhead.

Mr. Hayhoe: £46,000, which I understand was in accordance with the district valuer's valuation.

Civil Defence

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what joint plans have been agreed by the Government for the services of doctors, nurses or other National Health Service staff to be made available in the United Kingdom to support foreign military forces involved in the reinforcement of Europe if this became necessary during grave national tension;

(2) what joint plans have been agreed by the Government for hospitals and other National Health Service facilities, properties, supplies or equipment to be made available in the United Kingdom to support foreign military forces involved in the reinforcement of Europe if this became necessary during grave national tension.

Mr. Whitney: The Government are making contingency plans for the best use of all National Health Service resources in an emergency and these will cover the treatment in United Kingdom hospitals of both British and other NATO military casualties. Plans will be incorporated in those for the National Health Service as a whole in time of crisis or war, and are part of a continuous process. In addition the United States is establishing its own contingency hospitals which will be activated in a crisis; these will be equipped, manned and financed by the United States' Government and will reduce the burden on the National Health Service. Detailed planning is classified.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, by each office of his Department, and housing authority, the total amounts of housing benefit owing by way of arrears as of 1 January.

Mr. Major: This information is not available centrally. Local authorities are responsible for administering the housing benefits scheme and where possible should determine a claim for benefit within 14 days of receiving the information required to calculate entitlement. If the hon. Member would like to know the position in any particular authority he should contact that authority direct.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide a breakdown of the number of family income supplement recipients according to the 16 occupational categories since 1981.

Mr. Newton: The information is:

Occupation	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985

Rent Arrears

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many recipients of housing benefit, by housing authority area, were in rent arrears on 1 January as a result of non-payment by his Department of moneys due to the housing authority.

Mr. Major: The Department makes monthly payments on account to local authorities to enable them to award benefit under the housing benefits scheme. The authorities estimate the sums they will need to spend at the start of each financial year and can submit a revised claim for subsidy if necessary during the year. There is no reason therefore why authorities should not have adequate funds to award rent rebates to those tenants entitled to benefit.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applicants for mobility allowance have had to wait for longer than six months for any payment to be made in each of the last five years; and what is the average waiting time for payment of mobility allowance.

Mr. Newton: I regret that a record is not kept of the number of claims where it takes longer than six months to pay mobility allowance. Virtually all claims are decided initially by the adjudicating officer on the basis of a report by an examining medical practitioner. The average time taken for a claimant who is successful at this stage to receive payment is currently nine and a half weeks.

Industrial Injuries

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what comments he has received from the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council about his Department's consultation paper on the industrial injuries scheme; when those comments will be published; what other organisations and individuals have submitted comments to him on the consultation paper; and what views they expressed on it.

Mr. Newton: Copies of the council's response were placed in the Library on 12 March. Their main comments were that the scheme should continue to compensate all levels of industrial disablement and that major policy decisions should be deferred until the results of the OPCS survey of disabled people were known.

The following organisations submitted comments, as well as about 40 individuals:

Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers
Borough of Stockport
British Medical Association
Confederation of British Industry
Confederation of Health Service Employees
Dairy Trade Federation
Disability Alliance
Disablement Income Group
Engineering Employers Federation
General Municipal Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union
Leicester City Council
National and Local Government Officers Association
Policy Studies Institute
Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation
Royal College of Physicians
Trades Union Congress
Union of Democratic Mineworkers

All respondents welcomed the proposals to extend the scheme to cover accidents abroad and to abolish unemployability supplement. The majority favoured the indexation of awards of special hardship allowance and the payment of the allowance at all levels of disablement. Most respondents did not support the proposals relating to constant attendance allowance, gratuities for disablement below 15 per cent., the aligning of national insurance and industrial injuries widow's provisions, and special hardship allowance for those over national insurance pension age. Views for and against the ending of hospital treatment allowance were fairly evenly balanced.

ENVIRONMENT

British Nuclear Fuels plc

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement giving the characteristics, constituent components and radio-activity in terms of total activity, concentration and inclusion of particulate matter, fission products, actinides, and fissile products and plutonium contained within the matter, discharged from Sellafield on 23 January, together with the total volume of the discharge, the rates of the discharge, and the times and duration of the discharge.

Mr. Waldegrave: On 23 January, 1,466m³ of low active liquid waste was discharged between 1230 hours and 1630 hours, at a rate of about 400m³ per hour. That discharge included the additional arisings from the malfunction in the uranium finishing plant. The total activity of material from that plant amounted to 9 GBq corresponding to the purified uranium present which contained only trace quantities of fission products and plutonium. The U-235 fissile content of the uranium was 0·4 per cent., ie less than natural level. The uranium was present in the form of ammonium diuranate associated with ferric hydroxide as solids in suspension, and to the extent of 300 ppm by weight.

House of Commons (Static Electricity)

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has had, or will have, with the officials of the House responsible for the safety of those working in the House about the safety implications of excessive static electricity within the bounds of the House.

Sir George Young: The atmosphere in the House can become highly charged for a number of reasons. Although sparks may fly on occasions, there appears to be no firm evidence that the discomfort or shock caused by such discharges of energy constitute a danger to health. Indeed, I have noticed a stimulant effect in some cases.

Local Government Finance

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the figures for corporation tax, corporation tax (excluding receipts on North sea operations), and for industrial, commercial and public utilities' rates which underlie figure 7 on page 12 of Cmnd. 9714.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The figures are as follows:

£ '000m

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the outturn or budgeted total of local authority revenue expenditure in each year from 1979-80 to 1985-86, showing how much of this total was funded by (a) non-domestic rates, (b) domestic rates, net of rebates, (c) rate rebates, (d) rate support grant, (e) specific and supplementary grants and (f) other income services.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The lastest available information based on returns from local authorities is as follows:

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the calculations behind the figures stated as being the average charge for water and sewage provision in England and Wales in chapter 8, paragraph 5 of the Green Paper, "Paying for Local Government."

Mr. John Patten: The basic figures the hon. Member refers to are as follows:

	£.p.
A. England and Wales
Average domestic rate bill	344·00
*Water supply	39·92
*Sewerage and environmental	45·93

Rates

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total paid in domestic rates (a) gross and (b) net of rebates in each year from 1979-80 to 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Estimates of domestic rates income in England are as follows:

£'000 million

	Domestic Rate Income (gross of rebates)	Domestic Rate Income (Net of rebates)
1979-80	2·6	2·5
1980-81	3·4	3·2
1981-82	4·2	3·9
1982-83	4·9	4·4
1983-84	5·3	4·2
1984-85	5·6	4·4
1985-86	6·1	4·8

Notes: The figures are net of domestic rate relief grant. The estimates are derived from total rate income allocated to the domestic sector on the basis of its rateable value share.

The rate rebate figures netted off include those paid in respect of supplementary benefit recipients under the housing benefit scheme, which was partially introduced in November 1982 and fully in April 1983. Equivalent sums paid to supplementary benefit recipients under previous arrangements are given in earlier years.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total paid in non-domestic rates to local authorities in England in each year from 1979-80 to 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Estimates of non-domestic rate income in England are as follows:

£'000 million

	Non-domestic rate income
1979-80	3·4
1980-81	4·2
1981-82	5·1
1982-83	5·9
1983-84	6·3
1984-85	6·6
1985-86	7·2

Note: The estimates are derived from total rate income allocated to the non-domestic sector on the basis of its rateable value share.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the level of domestic rates relief in (a) England and (b) Wales in each of the past 10 years.

Mrs. Rumbold: Domestic rate relief in England has been 18·5p in the pound since 1975-76, except for four London boroughs (City of London, Camden, Kensington and Chelsea, and Westminster) where it has varied. Domestic rate relief in Wales was 36p in the pound between 1975-76 and 1982-83 (inclusive), and 18·5p in the pound since 1983-84.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average unrebated domestic rates bill in (a) England and (b) Wales in the year 1984-85, and in each of the previous 12 years.

Mrs. Rumbold: The figures for 1973-74 onwards are as follows. Figures for earlier years are not available on a comparable basis:

Average unrebated domestic rate bills (per hereditament) (£)

	England	Wales
1973-74	60	43
1974-75	77	34

Tobacco Advertising

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy, when negotiating the new agreement with the tobacco companies on advertising and sponsorship, to seek to exclude publicity of the type given on television to the Benson and Hedges brand name during the 1986 Benson and Hedges snooker championships at Wembley; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: I cannot be specific about the changes I will seek to the voluntary agreement on sports sponsorship; my forthcoming negotiations with the tobacco industry will be confidential. It is, however, clear that there is considerable concern about the amount of TV exposure tobacco companies receive through sports sponsorship. I expect this area to form a central part of the discussion.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's response to the Environment Committee's report on radioactive waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government welcome the report as an important contribution to the nuclear debate. We shall want to consider its recommendations carefully.

Teachers (Salaries)

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish details of the current cost to local authorities of paying teachers' salaries; and what proportion in percentage terms this represents of the total sum collected in rates.

Mrs. Rumbold: The estimated costs of paying teachers in England for 1985-86 are as follows, with the percentages which they represent of the total sum collected in rates:

	Pay Costs	Pay Costs as Per cent. of Rates
	£ million
Primary and secondary teachers	5,300	44·4
Further education teachers	1,330	11·1

The figures include London weighting, national insurance and superannuation and are based on local authority returns which relate to their 1985-86 budgets. The figures take account of the 1985-86 pay round.

The pay cost of these teachers represents 30 per cent. of total expenditure which is financed by rates and block grant.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is yet in a position to say how many staff in his Department will be working wholly or partly on functions arising out of the Local Government Act 1985 and the implementation of the abolition of the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council during the financial year 1986-87; what is the estimated cost for 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: Much of the Department's work on functions affected by the Local Government Act 1985 will be handled by staff within the appropriate policy areas and will not be separately identifiable. A reduced central capacity will be retained to co-ordinate the implementation of the Act, but it is too early to give estimates of the numbers of staff likely to be involved through 1986-87.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many leaflets entitled the "New Structure of South Yorkshire Government from 1st April" have been produced; to whom they are to be distributed; and what is the total cost including the cost of preparation.

Mr. Tracey: My Department has produced and distributed to all households and business premises in south Yorkshire 500,000 copies of the leaflet "The New Structure of Goverment in South Yorkshire". The cost of printing was £8,387.

It is not possible to break down the costs of preparation and distribution as between the GLC and the metropolitan county areas. The total costs of preparation and distribution were £4,300 and £150,504, respectively.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many leaflets entitled the "New Structure of West Yorkshire's Government from 1st April" have been produced; to whom they are to be distributed; and what is the total cost including the cost of preparation.

Mr. Tracey: My Department has produced and distributed to all households and business premises in west Yorkshire 800,000 copies of the leaflet "The New Structure of Government in West Yorkshire". The cost of printing was £8,711.

It is not possible to break down the costs of preparation and distribution as between the GLC and the metropolitan county areas. The total costs of preparation and distribution were £4,300 and £150,504 respectively.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many leaflets entitled the "New Structure of Merseyside's Government from 1st April" have been produced; to whom they are to be distributed; and what is the total cost including the cost of preparation.

Mr. Tracey: My Department has produced and distributed to all households and business premises in Merseyside 600,000 copies of the leaflet "The New Structure of Government in Merseyside". The cost of printing was £7,270.

It is not possible to break down the costs of preparation and distribution as between the GLC and the metropolitan county areas. The total costs of preparation and distribution were £4,300 and £150,504 respectively.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many leaflets entitled the "New Structure of West Midlands' Government from 1st April" have been produced; to whom they are to be distributed; and what is the total cost including the cost of preparation.

Mr. Tracey: My Department has produced and distributed to all households and business premises in the West Midlands 1,000,000 copies of the leaflet "The New Structure of Government in the West Midlands". The cost of printing was £10,034.

It is not possible to break down the costs of preparation and distribution as between the GLC and the metropolitan county areas. The total costs of preparation and distribution were £4,300 and £150,504 respectively.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many leaflets entitled the "New Structure of Tyne and Wear's Government from 1st April" have been produced; to whom they are to be distributed; and what is the total cost including the cost of preparation.

Mr. Tracey: My Department has produced and distributed to all households and business premises in Tyne and Wear 500,000 copies of the leaflet "The New Structure of Government in Tyne and Wear". The cost of printing was £5,964.

It is not possible to break down the costs of preparation and distribution as between the GLC and the metropolitan county areas. The total costs of preparation and distribution were £4,300 and £150,504 respectively.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many leaflets entitled the "New Structure of Greater Manchester's Government from 1st April" have been produced; to whom they are to be distributed; and what is the total cost including the cost of preparation.

Mr. Tracey: My Department has produced and distributed to all households and business premises in Greater Manchester 1,000,000 copies of the leaflet "The New Structure of Government in Greater Manchester". The cost of printing was £9,744.

It is not possible to break down the costs of preparation and distribution as between the GLC and the metropolitan county areas. The total costs of preparation and distribution were £4,300 and £150,504 respectively.

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many leaflets entitled the "New Structure of London's Government from 1st April" have been produced; to whom they are to be distributed; and what is the total cost including the cost of preparation.

Mr. Tracey: My Department has produced and distributed to all households and business premises in the Greater London area 2,650,000 copies of the leaflet "The New Structure of London's Government". The cost of printing was £24,344.

It is not possible to break down the costs of preparation and distribution as between the GLC and the metropolitan county areas. The total costs of preparation and distribution were £4,300 and £150,504 respectively.

GLC (Consent Applications)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to St. George's way site, Burgess park, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985;

(2) when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to changing rooms, Burgess park, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985;

(3) when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to the sports area car park, Burgess park, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985;

(4) when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to Trinity college, craft choice sites layout, Burgess park, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985;

(5) when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent for the site 34 layout, Mile End, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985;

(6) when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to sites 9, 10 and 11 (part layout), Mile End park, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985;

(7) when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to the site 8 layout, Mile End park, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985;

(8) when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to site 26 layout, Mile End park, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985;

(9) when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to the new athletics track at Finsbury Park, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985;

(10) when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to the site 33 layout, Mile End park, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985.

Mr. Tracey: Further information on these applications was sought from the GLC on 11 November 1985. This is still awaited.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to have completed his consideration of application for the consent to renewal of boundary fencing, Finsbury Park for which the Greater London council applied on 29 January.

Mr. Tracey: Consent was given on 19 February 1986.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to a grant towards the operating costs of the 1985 Brent carnival for which the Greater London council applied on 26 June 1985.

Mr. Tracey: Consent was refused on 6 March 1986.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to have completed his consideration of application for consent to Pagoda landscaping, stage 2, Battersea park, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985.

Mr. Tracey: Further information was sought from the GLC on 18 December 1985. This has not yet been received.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to post and rail fencing at Burdett gardens, Mile End park, for which the Greater London council applied on 29 January.

Mr. Tracey: Consent was given on 27 February 1986.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for landscape work at Gallions lake, South Edge, Thamesmead, for which the Greater London council applied on 13 February.

Mr. Tracey: Consent was given on 11 March 1986.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to temporary open space, Coin street, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985.

Mr. Tracey: Consent was given on 14 February 1986.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to have completed his consideration of the application for consent to phase 4 at Wormwood Scrubs, for which the Greater London council applied on 15 July 1985.

Mr. Tracey: Consent was refused on 24 February 1986.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 11 March, Official Report, column 433-34, what was the date on which his Department requested further information from the Greater London council in respect of the following outstanding consents: 5 Westminster bridge road SE1, Anti-Racist Awareness, Battersea park, each of the four applications for Burgess park, Carrington House Support Team, Civil Defence Video Films, Dial-A-Ride, Finsbury park, Mile End, each of the four applications for Mile End park, Parliament hill, Spar housing association, Victoria park-Burdett gardens and Yarnton way, Thamesmead.

Mr. Tracey: The following is the information:

5 Westminister bridge road SE1—13 February 1986
Anti-Racist Awareness—8 July 1985
Battersea park—11 November 1985
Burgess park—11 November 1985

Croxteth Hall and Park

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 7 March, Official Report, column 286, to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) what allowances for Croxteth hall and park were made available in the 1986-87 rate support grant settlement; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: £0·6 million of expenditure on Croxteth hall, and £0·3 million on Croxteth park, was assumed to pass from Merseyside county council to Liverpool city council. Liverpool's grant-related expenditure for museums and galleries increased by £0·9 million and for recreation by £0·4 million.

Nature Conservancy Council (Geological Observation Unit)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from geologists about the Nature Conservancy Council's geological conservation unit; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: A number of representations have been received. I am satisfied that the Nature Conservancy Council fully recognises the importance of geological conservation. It has significantly expanded its activities in this area with increases in both permanent and contract staff. Further increases in permanent staff are planned.

Voluntary Organisations (Grants)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, under the following heads, all those consulted during the process of considering applications submitted to his Department by local authorities for transitional grant for voluntary organisations formerly funded by the Greater London council under the following heads (a) organisations outside Government, including political parties and )b) private individuals, including local councillors.

Sir George Young: No formal consultations were held. The Secretary of State did, however, take such steps as he considered necessary to ensure that transitional grant funds would be applied effectively.

County Hall, London

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has received any approaches from the Metropolitan police for the use of the County hall, London SE1

Mr. Tracey: No.

Council House Sales

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many sales of council houses to tenants were completed in Bolton during 1985.

Sir George Young: Bolton district council reported 334 sales to sitting tenants during 1985.

"Acid Rain"

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek from the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board a copy of the board's film "Acid Rain"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department has received a copy of this film. Its contents are entirely a matter for the Central Electricity Generating Board.

Citadels

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which five of the second world war citadels mentioned in his answer on 25 February, Official Report, column 491, now remains on the Government estate; and by which department or departments the citadels are now used.

Sir George Young: The five citadels are Broad Sanctuary; Admiralty, Curzon Street House and Montague House; and Horseferry road. They are currently allocated to the Treasury, Ministry of Defence and the Department of Transport respectively.

Docklands (House Sales)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give an annual breakdown, since 1981, of all houses sold in Docklands and the percentage costing under £40,000.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 18 November 1985, c. 63]: The information is given in the following table:

Breakdown of house sales on LDDC owned land by fiscal year to 30 September 1985

Sites in	1981-82		1982-83		1983-84		1984-85		1 April 1985 to 30 September 1985

EMPLOYMENT

Ethnic Minorities (MSC Assistance)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on available Manpower Services Commission assistance to ethnic minorities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Manpower Services Commission's policy is to make its services available equally to all, regardless of ethnic origin, sex or disability. Programmes are mounted specifically for ethnic minorities where they have special needs, such as language training, or where they are under-represented in particular skills or occupations. The Manpower Services Commission monitors the participation of ethnic minorities in most of its programmes and will shortly monitor their participation in the remaining programmes, in order to find out whether they are under-represented. I hope to consider soon with the MSC ways by which we might increase the effectiveness of our programmes in inner city areas and amongst ethnic minorities.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Merchant asked the Paymaster General how many persons aged (a) 16 years and (b) 17 years are at present engaged in YTS schemes in (i) Newcastle upon Tyne and (ii) England and Wales, in total and as a proportion of the age group.

Mr. Trippier: I regret that the information is not available in the precise form requested. However, at 28 February 1986, the latest date for which statistics are available, there were 2,031 young people of all ages in training on YTS in Newcastle upon Tyne.

In the training division Newcastle area as a whole there were 4,848 young people in training and 245,802 in England and Wales. These two figures represent 65 and 52 per cent. respectively of the young people eligible to join YTS.

Union Membership

Mr. Silvester asked the Paymaster General if he will introduce legislation to prevent employers refusing employment to candidates unless they agree to join a union, in cases where such union membership agreement has not been approved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am continually monitoring the effectiveness of the protection we have provided against abuses of the closed shop and keeping under review the need for further legislation.

The law already provides that no one can be dismissed without compensation for not belonging to a trade union in an unapproved closed shop. This protection is available to new recruits from their first day of employent.

Ethnic Minority Population (Entrepreneurial Skills)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Paymaster General what steps he is taking to promote a growth in entrepreneurial skills amongst the ethnic minority population in the inner cities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Winnick asked the Paymaster General how many of those in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the west midlands and (c) the Black Country area of the west midlands have been unemployed for 12 months and more; what the numbers were in May 1979; and what has been the percentage change in the three groups, retrospectively.

Mr. Lang: The following table gives the available information for the United Kingdom and the west midlands.

Unemployed-Over 12 months

	United Kingdom	West Midlands
Unemployed Registrants
April 1979	366,711	34,154
October 1982	1,169,558	155,741
Percentage increase	+219	+356
Unemployed Claimants
October 1982	989,306	129,706
April 1983	1,143,436	154,460
Percentage increase	+15·6	+19·1
April 1983	1,143,436	154,460
October 1983	1,142,874	152,423

Comparisons over this period are affected by the provisions in the 1983 Budget, which removed 160,000 people overall from the count, some 18,700 in the west midlands.

	United Kingdom	West Midlands
October 1983	1,142,874	152,423
January 1986	1,371,632	165,824
Percentage increase	+20	+8·8

On 9 January 1986, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available, in the Dudley and Sandwell, Walsall and Wolverhampton travel-to-work areas, that closely correspond to the Black Country area, the number of claimants who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 50,082.

Comparisons of unemployment over the period specified are difficult to make because of the change in the basis of the count in October 1982, the 1983 Budget provisions, which mean that some men, mainly aged 60 or over, no longer need to sign on at unemployment benefit offices to receive benefit, and, for local areas, the change to a ward-based system for allocating claimants to localities. However, in April 1979 (not available for May 1979) the number of registrants at jobcentres within the old Dudley and Sandwell, Walsall and Wolverhampton travel-to-work areas as defined in 1978, who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 8,164.

Mr. Winnick asked the Paymaster General how many persons under 21 years in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the west midlands and (c) the Black Country area of the west midlands have been unemployed for 12 months and more; what the numbers were in May 1979; and what has been the percentage change in the three groups, respectively.

Mr. Lang: The following table gives the available information for the United Kingdom and the west midlands.

Under 20 years of age and unemployed for over 12 months

	United Kingdom	West Midlands
Unemployed registrants
April 1979	19,799	1,837
October 1982	101,414	12,805
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Percentage increase	+412	+59
Unemployed claimants
October 1982	88,595	11,387
January 1986	104,600	12,499
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Percentage increase	+18·1	+9·8

On 9 January 1986, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by age and duration is available, in the Dudley and Sandwell, Walsall and Wolverhampton travel-to-work areas that closely correspond to the Black Country area, the number of unemployed claimants aged under 20 years (not available for under 21 years) who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 3,778.

Comparisons of unemployment over the period specified are difficult to make because of the change in the basis of the count in October 1982 and, for local areas, the change to a ward-based system for allocating claimants to localities. However, in April 1979 (not available for May 1979) the number of unemployed registrants at jobcentres within the old Dudley and Sandwell, Walsall and Wolverhampton travel-to-work areas, as defined in 1978, aged under 20 years and who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 434.

Mr. Winnick asked the Paymaster General if he will give the total number of full-time employees made redundant in (a) the west midlands and (b) the Black Country area of the west midlands since May 1979; what were the figures for the seven years prior to May 1979; and what is the change in percentage terms in the two areas, respectively.

Mr. Lang: The latest available figures for all confirmed redundancies are set out in the table. To extract the information on redundancies of full-time employees would involve disproportinate cost. Data on confirmed redundancies are not available for years before 1977.

Redundancies confirmed as due to occur 1977 to 1985*
Black Country

Period	Jobcentre areas	West Midlands
May 1979 to December 1985†	82,410	277,788
January 1977 to April 1979	6,908	20,200

* Confirmed by the Manpower Services Commission as due to occur and based on notifications of impending redundancies involving ten or more workers.

† Includes provisional figures for December 1985.

Civil Defence

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Paymaster General what joint plans have been agreed by the Government for the services of British civilian workers in any capacity to be made available in the United Kingdom to support foreign military forces involved in the reinforcement of Europe if this became necessary during grave national tension.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: An arrangement between the United States and the United Kingdom permits the United States to establish, operate and maintain lines of communication and ancillary facilities in the United Kingdom for use under emergency conditions as part of its NATO obligations, with the proviso that the United Kingdom Government always have priority in the use of national resources. As part of the arrangement, the United Kingdom has agreed to take steps to try to ensure that its requirements for civilian manpower support are met. Detailed planning in support of the arrangment is classified.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. William Shelton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the percentage of the total adult population in the United Kingdom who pay income tax.

Mr. Moore: In 1985-86 it is estimate that about 65 per cent. of the total of single people and married couples pay income tax. The figures exclude young people aged under 16 and those over 16 still at school.

Sir Peter Horden asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what a single person earning £140 a week would pay now, in income tax and national insurance contributions, at the current rates, allowances and rate bands; and what such a person would pay at 1978-79 rates, allowances and rate bands.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 13 March 1986, c. 582]: The information for each year is as follows:

(£ per week)

	1978-79	1985-86
Earnings	140·00	140·00
Income Tax	38·80	29·28
NIC	7·80	12·60
Income Tax + NIC	46·60	41·88

Sir Peter Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what a single person earning £8,500 a year would have to pay in income tax (a) at rates, allowances and rate bands and (b) at rates, allowances and rate bands obtaining in June 1979.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 13 March 1986, c. 582]: The information for each year is as follows:

(£ per annum)

	1979-80*	1985-86
Earnings	8,500	8,500
Income Tax	2,163	1,888·50

* At income tax rates and allowances for 1979-80 in the Finance (No. 2) Act 1979.

Cigarettes (Taxation)

Mr. Dubs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the extra revenue in a full year of increasing the tax on cigarettes by 10p, 15p and 25p, respectively, per packet of 20 cigarettes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The estimated net additional revenue, at 1986-87 prices, would be:

Increase in price of 20 cigarettes (pence)	Full year revenue yield (£ million)
10	310
15	460
25	750

The larger the price increase, the greater the degree of uncertainty to which these estimates are subject.

Taxation (Commercial Woodlands)

Mr. John asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what additional tax revenue would be yielded by abolition of the schedule B option for owners of commercial woodlands.

Mr. Moore: The revenue cost of the election available to an occupier of commercial woodlands to be assessed under schedule D instead of schedule B is tentatively estimated at £10 million for 1985-86.

Mr. John asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) for each of the last 10 years, what was the number of instances in which commercial woodland changed from taxation under schedule B to taxation under schedule D; what was the total area of land involved: and if he will give equivalent figures for changes from schedule D to schedule B;

(2) how many owners of commercial woodland have opted for taxation under schedule B and schedule D, respectively; and what area of commercial woodland is taxed under each schedule.

Mr. Moore: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mr. John asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what basis commercial woodland is valued for purposes of schedule B taxation; and what is the average valuation per acre.

Mr. Moore: The assessable value of woodlands for the purpose of schedule B is one-third of the annual value of the land in its natural and unimproved state.

The average value per acre used for schedule B purposes is 45p.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Wainwright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what guidance he gives to retailers about including in value added tax returns the proceeds of sales of gas board and electricity board stamps; and whether he intends any change in this respect.

Mr. Brooke: Customs and Excise notice 727 (VAT: Retail Schemes), which is published pursuant to the Value Added Tax (Supplies by Retailers) Regulations 1972 (as amended), explains the conditions of the schemes which may be used by retailers as simplified methods of working out their VAT.

Customs and Excise issued amendment No. 1 to the notice in February 1986, which requires any retailers who sell gas, electricity, television licence or similar savings stamps to deal with the stamps outside their retail scheme calculations. It follows the decision of the Manchester VAT tribunal in the case of T.G., M. & I.J. Parr (MAN/85/241) which held that retailers could include gas and electricity savings stamps in their scheme calculations since notice No. 727 did not specifically require them not to do so.

I am placing a copy of notice No. 727 and of amendment No. 1 in the Library.

EC (Budget)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why the budget for 1986 which was approved by the Council of Ministers was prepared using an assumption of an exchange rate of one dollar=1·20 European currency units; who was responsible for making the assumption; if the assumption was discussed at the meeting of the Council; and what view Her Majesty's Government took of this assumption.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Gaston Schloh (European Court Judgment)

Mr. Jackson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the United Kingdom is implementing the Court of Justice judgment in the Gaston Schloh case (85/82).

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 7 March 1986, c. 284]: Yes. The European Court of Justice judgment of 5 May 1982 in the case of Gaston Schloh (15/81) was implemented in the United Kingdom in October 1982.

Tax Thresholds

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will express for each year since 1955-56 the tax threshold as a percentage of average earnings for a single person, married couple, married couple with two children and married couple with four children.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986, c. 390]: I refer the hon. Member to appendix C of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1985", a copy of which is in the Library.

Lump Sum Payments

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many appeals against decisions of inspectors of taxes to seek to assess lump sum payments made in consideration of taking up employment have been heard before (a) the general commissioners and (b) the special commissioners in the last 12 months; and in how many cases the commissioners have held the payments not to be assessable.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1986, c. 458]: There is no centrally held record of either the numbers or outcome of the appeals heard in the last 12 months by the Appeal Commissioners against the assessment to tax of such payments. This could be ascertained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce legislation to amend the law relating to the assessment to income tax on lump sum payments made in consideration of taking up employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1986 c. 458]: I cannot anticipate my right hon. Friend's Budget statement.

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what clearances have been given by the Inland Revenue for schemes providing for payment of a lump sum contingent on a partner remaining within a particular partnership for a specified period that they will not seek to tax them as income; and if he will make a statment.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 11 March 1986, c. 458]: I shall write to the hon. Member if he will let me know the details of any particular case he has in mind.

THE ARTS

South Bank Centre

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts (1) if he will publish a list of existing staff by grade and members who have been offered employment in the South Bank concert halls following abolition of the Greater London council;

(2) how many staff to date in the South Bank concert halls have failed to secure employment in the halls following abolition of the Greater London council;

(3) if he will provide a breakdown by numbers and categories of the full-time staff to be employed by the South Bank board in the South Bank concert halls following abolition of the Greater London council;

(4) how many of the existing staff of the South Bank concert halls have been offered jobs by successful tenderers for contracted-out services.

Mr. Luce: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the future of the South Bank craft centre.

Mr. Luce: It is intended that the present operation will continue for the foreseeable future, essentially unchanged.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts what progress has been made by the South Bank board with interested parties connected with the continuance of Thamesday, South Bank Weekend and the Children's Festival; who has been consulted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: A meeting has been arranged for 24 March, to be hosted by the South Bank board, and including representatives of:

The London Council of Sport and Recreation
The Corporation of London
Westminster City Council
The London Visitor and Conventions Bureau
Thames Water Authority
The Greater London Council

I am confident that events of this kind will have a fixed place in the future pattern of activities on the South Bank.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts how many of the existing staff currently employed in the South Bank concert halls and offered employment by the South Bank board do not qualify for financial detriment.

Mr. Luce: Detriment is a matter to be determined by the London Residuary Body.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts if he will provide a breakdown of the expenses incurred by the executive chairman and members of the South Bank group and, since its formal constitution on 1 September 1985, the South Bank board to date.

Mr. Luce: The expenses are broken down as follows:

Travel	4,639
Subsistence	1,244
Other expenses	1,816
	7,699

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts what is the amount budgeted by the South Bank board for expenses for 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: No specific item in the budget is attributable to "expenses".

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts, pursuant to his reply of 11 February, Official Report, column 429, what information was gathered by Mr. Pulford and Mr. Grierson from their fact-finding visits to the United States of America, Canada and Australia.

Mr. Luce: A great deal of useful information was obtained about the organisation and operation of multi-purpose arts centres.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts how the South Bank board intends to give more emphasis to literature in the South Bank centre; and what alternative locations for bookspace are being considered.

Mr. Luce: The South Bank board is considering the relocation on the South Bank of the Arts Council's poetry library, the greater use of the Purcell room for events with a literary content, and an extension of bookselling facilities. The board will be considering which will be the most appropriate spaces for literary purposes, once it has full access to the South Bank concert halls after 1 April.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts pursuant to his reply of 11 February, Official Report, column 429, if he will provide a breakdown of the £8,024 paid by the Arts Council for the fact-finding visits to the United States of America, Canada and Australia by Mr. Pulford and Mr. Grierson.

Mr. Luce: The expenses amounted to £8,042, divided as to:

Travel	5,832
Subsistence	2,210

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts pursuant to his reply of 11 February, if he will provide details of the contract of employment between the general director (administration) and the South Bank board.

Mr. Luce: The contract has not yet been issued.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts pursuant to his answer on 11 February, Official Report, column 429, which arts organisations were visited in the United States of America, Canada and Australia by Mr. Pulford and Mr. Grierson.

Mr. Richard Luce: The information is as follows:

In the United States:
- The Lincoln Centre, New York
- Carnegie Hall, New York
- The Brooklyn Academy of Music
- The Kennedy Centre, Washington
- The Music Centre, Los Angeles
- The National Endowment for the Arts, Washington
- New York City Hall

In Canada
- Harbourfront Centre, Toronto
- O'Keefe Centre, Toronto
- Roy Thomson Hall, Toronto
- St. Lawrence Centre, Toronto
- Ontario Ministry of Citizenship and Culture

In Australia
- Sydney Opera House
- Brisbane Arts Centre
- Victoria Arts Centre, Melbourne
- The Australia Council
- Offices of the Ministers for the Arts, New South Wales, Victoria and Queensland

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts when the Arts Council will announce the level of funding of the South Bank board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: An announcement should be made later this month.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts, pursuant to his reply of 10 February, Official Report, column 379, what progress has been made by the South Bank board in contracting out cleaning services, security and some maintenance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: Tenders have been accepted in all cases.

Topolski (Memoir of the Century)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts what conditions have been agreed between the South Bank board and the London Residuary Body about the future of Felix Topolski's Memoir of the Century.

Mr. Luce: It is intended that the Memoir of the Century should continue to be housed and serviced on the present basis.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

"Rights of Access to Neighbouring Land"

Mr. Colvin asked the Attorney-General when he proposes to bring forward legislation along the lines of the proposals in the Law Commission's report, Cmnd. 9692, "Rights of Access to Neighbouring Land"; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: This report was published only in December 1985. Since it raises questions of general public interest, the Government intend to allow a reasonable time for public comment before deciding whether to give effect to the Law Commission's recommendations.

ENVIRONMENT

Rates

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish, for every rating authority in England, a table consistent with figure J3 on page 121 of Cmnd. 9714, showing also the total gross domestic rates paid in each authority in the base year used for the construction of figure J3.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Figure J3 illustrates the pattern of changes in income for local authorities which could result from the implementation of the grant and non-domestic rate changes proposed in the Green Paper. Like all the illustrations in the Green Paper it is based on 1984-85 expenditure, GRE and grant figures and on notional rate poundages as calculated for block grant purposes, disregarding grant holdback. At the level of aggregation provided in the Green Paper, calculations based on the assumption that the relative magnitudes of these figures will remain unchanged give a reasonable guide to the likely impact of the proposals. At the level of individual authorities, however, it is unlikely that these assumptions would still be valid by the time any changes were implemented. So the figures for individual authorities could not be regarded as a reliable guide to the impact of the proposals at that level.

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authorities in England and Wales set rate increases of over 20 per cent. for 1985-86 compared with 1984-85.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information is as follows:

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will make a statement on meetings he has had with representatives of the ENSEC method of nuclear waste disposal;

(2) when he last had discussions relating to the ENSEC method of nuclear waste disposal; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what discussions he has had with the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive regarding the ENSEC method of nuclear waste disposal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has not had any meetings with representatives of ENSEC Ltd. although I did so on 2 November 1983. With regard to discussions with NIREX, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 11 March 1986 at columns 431-2. In the course of these discussions the ENSEC proposal has been raised.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list the alternative methods of nuclear waste disposal, apart from land dumping, which have been presented to his Department for consideration;

(2) what is his Department's assessment of the safety implications of using the ENSEC method of nuclear waste disposal;

(3) what is his Department's assessment of the environmental implications of using the ENSEC method of nuclear waste disposal;

(4) what assessment his Department has made of the potential uses of the ENSEC method of nuclear waste disposal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The study of best practicable environmental options (BPEOs) for the management of low and intermediate level wastes, recently completed under my Department's direction, examined all the main alternative management methods. The options considered were—sea disposal; near-surface land burial in simple trenches; near-surface land burial in concrete-lined trenches preceded by 10 years' storage for current stocks of wastes; land burial in deep cavities, preceded by, respectively, 15, 45 and 200 years' storage for current stocks; burial in off-shore boreholes preceded by 15 years' storage for current stocks; and long-term surface storage.

Copies of the report are in the Library.

The study's assessment of off-shore disposal was based on an outline proposal by ENSEC. The study found that the option would be unnecessarily complex and expensive for low-level and shorter-lived intermediate level wastes. For longer-lived intermediate level radioactive wastes, the option would be comparable in terms of cost and radiological impact with land burial in deep cavities. Site-specific studies and engineering designs would be necessary to determine which option was the BPEO. The concept of disposing of wastes in offshore boreholes is not so well-developed as that of deep land disposal. Wastes buried offshore would not be so easily retrievable.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will instruct the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive to prepare a public consultation document on any alternative method of nuclear waste disposal which it has considered.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. The Government have the responsibility for determining the overall strategy for the management of radioactive waste, including optimum disposal routes. It is, therefore, for the Government to consult on the options as they arise; and this they have done, in the production of the report on the study of the best practicable environmental options for the management of low and intermediate level radioactive waste made public on 13 March.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if, when he meets the chairman of the CEGB on 26 March, he will raise with him the ENSEC method of nuclear waste disposal; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will instruct the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive to investigate the ENSEC method of nuclear waste disposal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) on 30 October 1985 at column 531. Until the results of the feasibility studies commissioned by NIREX are known it would be premature to consider other possible studies or to include them in discussions with the chairman of the CEGB on 26 March.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what environmental groups he has consulted in formulating his policy regarding nuclear dumping.

Mr. Waldegrave: Most recently, my Department consulted seven national environmental and amenity groups during the preparation of the assessment of best practicable environmental options for the management of low and intermediate level solid radioactive wastes. The groups concerned were the Council for Environmental Conservation, the Council for the Protection of Rural England, Friends of the Earth, the Green Alliance, Greenpeace, the National Federation of Women's Institutes and the Town and Country Planning Association.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why he will not publish the names of all sites considered by the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive since 1 January 1985 as possibilities for the dumping of nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: I do not know the sites considered by NIREX.

Hazardous Wastes

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make available details of finances provided by his Department for research and development into methods of the disposal by land-filling of hazardous wastes, in each year since 1980; and if he will list the recipients of such moneys.

Mr. Waldegrave: The funding of research by my Department on the disposal of household and industrial wastes by land-filling since 1980 is as follows:—

1980-81	398
1981-82	521
1982-83	746
1983-84	670
1984-85	592
1985-86	628

Work on hazardous waste is included in these totals. The nature of most of the research contracts does not allow separate identification of work on hazardous wastes.

The recipients of the funding were:—

British Geological Survey
Water Research Centre
AERE—Harwell
Aspinwall and Company
Biotechnics Limited
M. J. Carter Associates
P. P. C. Consultant Services Limited
Amey Roadstone Corporation
Essex County Council
Leicester County Council
Suffolk County Council
Wrexham Maelor Borough Council
British Steel Corporation
National Physical Laboratory
Essex University

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make available details of finance provided by his Department for research and development into methods recognised as possible alternatives to land-fill hazardous waste disposal in each year since 1980; and if he will list the recipients of such money, method by method.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department has provided the following funds since 1980 for research and development into possible alternatives to land-filling of hazardous wastes.

Year	£'000
1980-81	27
1981-82	183
1982-83	225
1983-84	213
1984-85	186
1985-86	190

The recipients of the funding were:

Centre for Applied Microbiology Research—Porton
Waste Research Unit—Harwell
Imperial College
Dames & Moore Ltd.

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the total moneys spent by (a) central Government and (b) waste disposal authorities in England and Wales on the post-operative care and rehabilitation of hazardous waste land-fill sites.

Mr. Waldegrave: I regret that this information is not readily available. My Department does not keep a record of the amounts of money spent by waste disposal authorities on the post-operative care and rehabilitation of hazardous waste land-fill sites. Central Government expenditure in England for this purpose comes under my Department's allocation to derelict land reclamation, currently at £82 million; only a very small proportion of this total is likely to be allocated specifically to hazardous waste land-fill sites.

Non-human Primates

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total number of each species of non-human primate which have been imported into Britain in each year since 1979.

Mrs. Rumbold: Details of recorded imports of non-human primate species in 1979-83 are given in the annual reports on the implementation in the United Kingdom of the convention of international trade in endangered species (CITES) published by this Department.

Since January 1984, CITES has been implemented under EC regulation 3626/82; trade statistics for 1984 and 1985 will be published by the European Commission in due course. I shall write to the hon. Member with details of the United Kingdom figures.

Noise Levels (Sleep)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if Her Majesty's Government are planning any research projects on the adverse effects arising from noise interrupting sleep.

Mrs. Rumbold: A number of institutions, including the Medical Research Council collaborated in an EC study of the effects of noise on sleep as part of the third EC environment research programme. I also understand that the Transport and Road Research Laboratory is planning studies of nuisance from traffic noise including annoyance from sleep disturbance, though not the medical or other effects.

Sulphur Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the scale of the sulphur dioxide emissions in each of the European Economic Community countries for (a) 1974 and (b) the most recently available date.

Mrs. Rumbold: The United Kingdom is one of the few countries which publish information annually about national emissions. Full comparative data on EC countries' sulpher dioxide emissions are available only for those years which were the subject of data-gathering exercises carried out by international organisations. The nearest year to 1974 for which full figures are available is 1972 and the latest is 1982. The figures are as follows:

	million tonnes SO_2
Belgium	1·14	0·81
Denmark	0·48	0·40
France	3·53	2·54
Germany	3·91	3·00
Greece	0·20	0·34
Ireland	0·19	0·16
Italy	3·17	3·07
Luxembourg	0·05	0·02
Netherlands	0·59	0·40
Portugal	*0·18	†0·36
Spain	1·14	n.a.
United Kingdom	5·64	4·01

* 1973.
† 1983.
n.a.=not available.

Tipping

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report for each county in England the number of land-fill sites currently in use for controlled tipping.

Mrs. Rumbold: My Department does not collect this information.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report for the latest year for which information is available for each right hon. and hon. Member, the arithmetic mean in days that his Department took to reply to letters.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Information in the form requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, samples taken from the records of correspondence dealt with during the period October 1985 to December 1985 indicate that the average time taken to reply to hon. Members' correspondence is approximately 3½weeks.

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received concerning the future of voluntary organisations following the abolition of the Greater Manchester council; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The general secretary of the Greater Manchester Council for Voluntary Service has written an open letter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about funding of voluntary bodies after abolition. My Noble Friend the Minister of State will reply shortly, and I will place a copy of the correspondence in the Library.

Webbers Yard, Dartington

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, in the light of the answer on 3 December 1985, Official Report, column 171-2, to the hon. Member for South Hams in regard to Webbers Yard, Dartington, application for a grant from the European regional development fund for a new road, what steps he has taken and what steps he proposes to take to ensure a final decision is made by the European Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The Department of Trade and Industry, which leads on European regional development fund matters, is seeking a final decision from the European Commission on applications submitted for grant aid from areas which lost their assisted area status in November 1984. The Commission's decision will be notified to the authorities concerned as soon as possible.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authorities have taken legal action in respect of the 1985-86 rate support grant allocations.

Mrs. Rumbold: The following local authorities have taken legal action in respect of expenditure guidance or disregards or both: Lambeth, Hammersmith and Fulham, Newcastle, Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire and Bradford.

The following local authorities have taken legal action in respect of rate limitation: the GLC, the ILEA, Greenwich and Leicester.

Local Government Act 1985

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements he has made to provide information about the implementation of the Local Government Act 1985.

Mr. Tracey: A circular has today been issued to all borough and district councils in Greater London and the metropolitan counties and to other successor authorities. It provides a guide to the Act and describes the steps taken towards its implementation, including in particular matters which were not settled by the Act itself, and details of joint arrangements now being made by successor authorities of which the Department has been informed. I have arranged for copies of the circular to be placed in the Library. My Department has also recently issued an explanatory memorandum on the compensation and early release arrangements for staff affected by the Act. Copies of this have also been placed in the Library.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Racial Discrimination (Contract Compliance)

76. Mr. Dubs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will now introduce contract compliance as a means of tackling racial discrimination.

Mr. Brooke: The main objective of Government purchasing is to obtain value for money. Within Government contracts there is a standard condition that contractors shall not unlawfully discriminate within the meaning and scope of the provisions of the race relations legislation. When it comes to the attention of a Department that a contractor is discriminating unlawfully, the contractor will be asked to take any necessary preventive action.

Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970

Mr. Coombs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any decision has been made on the future of section 482 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970.

Mr. Moore: We have reviewed section 482 and its operation in the light of representations from business. We have concluded that it would be inappropriate to make any substantial changes to the legislation itself at the present time. I have, however, instructed the Inland Revenue to institute a reviwe of the general consents.

Section 482 contains a criminal penalty. The Government will consider the future of this penalty against the background of their deliberations and consultations on the recommendations of the Keith committee on enforcement powers of the Revenue departments.

EC (Government Loans)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer under which provisions of the European Community treaties Her Majesty's Government have made loans to the Community.

Mr. Brooke: Her Majesty's Government have not made any loans to the European Community under the provisions of a European Community treaty. A reimbursable advance of own resources was made in 1985 under the provisions of the 1984 intergovernmental agreement.

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what grounds Her Majesty's Government regard reimbursable advances to the European Economic Community by member states as revenue items.

Mr. Brooke: Article 4 of the 1970 own resources decision provides that the Community budget shall be financed "from 'own resources' irrespective of 'other revenue'". The Government, in common with the Governments of the other member states, regard the reimbursable advances paid to the Community under the 1984 IGA as 'other revenue'.

Lawyer-Client (Privilege)

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to hold discussions with representatives of the legal profession concerning the Keith committee recommendations on privilege between lawyer and client before any decisions thereon are reached by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Ian Stewart: As I said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) on 11 December, at column 654, the Inland Revenue has been authorised to continue its consultations with interested parties about the Keith committee recommendations. It is envisaged that these consultations will include the recommendations on privilege between lawyer and client.

Income Tax

Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report tables showing (a) the proportion in percentage terms, (b) the amount in current prices and (c) the amount in constant 1985-86 prices of personal income taken by taxation and rates for the year 1986-87, taking account of any changes announced in his Budget statement and any previously announced changes, and for each of the years 1978-79, 1979-80, 1980-81, 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86 for each level of average earnings, each category of taxpayer, and each category of taxation and rates, in the manner of the answers of 3 April 1985, Official Report, column 676, and of 2 July 1985, Official Report, column 112.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report for the latest year for which information is available for each right hon. and hon. Member, the arithmetic mean in days his Department took to reply to letters.

Mr. Brooke: The information in the form requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, in the last quarter of 1985 the arithmetic mean for replies by Treasury Ministers to letters from right hon. and hon. Members was 16 working days.

Customs and Excise

Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are his plans for implementing the recommendation of the joint review group on employment opportunities for women in the Civil Service relating to the provision of a job-sharing arrangement within Her Majesty's Customs and Excise; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The report of the joint review group on employment opportunities for women in the Civil Service was published in December 1982. Early in 1983 Customs and Excise issued a circular to all staff drawing attention to the report. Pending central discussions on the report between the Management and Personnel Office and the Council of Civil Service Unions, the Department has dealt on an ad hoc basis with requests for part-time working and job-sharing. At 1 March 1986, the Department had a total of 451 part-time employees. At clerical assistant, clerical officer and executive officer levels there are 77 staff who, at their own request, have changed from full-time to part-time working. Of these, 32 are in job-sharing partnerships (20 at executive officer level). In addition, there are three higher executive officers and one principal working part-time at their own request.

Agreed central guidance has now been issued to Departments and Customs and Excise has been examining its application to the Department, where 80 per cent. of the staff are employed locally on mainly operational duties. Draft proposals were sent to the Department trade union side on 17 March, and it is hoped that a detailed circular can be issued to all staff shortly.

Civil List

Mr. Wood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the total amount payable under the Civil List Acts to the Royal Family in the calendar years 1985 and 1986.

Mr. Lawson: The information on amounts payable to the royal family in the present and previous calendar year is as follows:

	1985 £	1986 £
The Queen's Civil List	3,976,200	4,136,800
HM Queen Elizabeth The Queen Mother	345,300	359,100
HRH The Duke of Edinburgh	192,600	200,300
HRH The Princess Anne, Mrs. Mark Phillips	120,000	124,800
HRH The Prince Andrew	20,000	20,000
HRH The Prince Edward	20,000	20,000
HRH The Princess Margaret, Countess of Snowdon	116,800	121,500
HRH Princess Alice, Duchess of Gloucester	47,300	49,200
HRH The Duke of Gloucester	94,000	97,800
HRH The Duke of Kent	127,000	132,000
HRH Princess Alexsandra Mrs. Angus Ogilvy	120,900	125,800
Total	5,180,100	5,387,300
Refunded by Her Majesty The Queen	341,900	355,600
	4,838,200	5,031,700

The increase in total is 4 per cent. These figures combine the sum payable directly from the Consolidated Fund with supplementation provided by the royal trustees via the Treasury Vote "Economic and financial Administration (HM Treasury) (Class XIX, Vote 12)"

Notes on payments to the royal family

1. Cash limit and running costs criteria have been applied to the figures for 1986.

2. Sums of £20,000 a year are payable from the Consolidated Fund in respect of their royal highnesses the Prince Andrew and the Prince Edward from the dates when they attained the age of 18 (19 February 1978 and 10 March 1982 respectively). An order was made by Her Majesty under section 4 of the Civil List Act 1952 limiting the annual amount to be paid to the Prince Edward from 1 January 1986 to £14,000.

3. Her Majesty paid £341,900 into the Consolidated Fund in respect of payments made in 1985 to members of the royal family whose expenses are met under section 3 of the Civil List Act 1972: a similar payment of £355,600 will be made for 1986.

Cash Limits

Mr. Coombs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide details of the cash limits set for 1986-87.

Mr. MacGregor: The cash limits on expenditure to be voted in Estimates are listed in the appendix of the summary and guide to 1986-87 Supply Estimates (Cmnd. 9742), rounded to the nearest £1 million, and are shown precisely in the relevant booklets of Supply Estimates. The cash limits on local authority capital spending and other expenditure which is not voted are given in the table.

Cash Limits on expenditure not voted in Estimates 1986-87

Cash block and Department	Description of expenditure	Cash limit £ million
BOE1
Bank of England	Bank of England administration costs in respect of note issue, debt management and exchange equalisation account	82·7

Cash block and Department	Description of expenditure	Cash limit £ million
DOE/HC1 Department of the Environment	Capital expenditure in England on housing financed through the Housing Corporation	585·0
DOE/LA1 Department of the Environment	Capital expenditure in England by local authorities on roads and transport, housing, schools, further education and teacher training, personal social services and other environmental services	2,361·2
DOE/NT1 Department of the Environment	Capital expenditure in England by new towns on housing, roads, commercial and industrial investment and certain water services	*−82·1
DOE/UA1 Department of the Environment	External financing requirements of Urban Development Corporations, capital expenditure on the urban programme and derelict land reclamation	349·5
HO/LA1 Home Office	Local authority public expenditure for capital projects on magistrates courts, probation and police service	127·0
HO/MP1 Home Office	Home Office expenditure by the Metropolitan Police on manpower, pay, pensions, premises, transport and other running costs	851·8
NID1 Northern Ireland Departments	Services broadly analogous to GB services covered by cash limits but including family practitioner services	2,288·5
SO/LA1 Scottish Office	Capital expenditure in Scotland by local authorities on roads and transport, water and sewerage, general services, urban programme, police and social work, schools, further education and teacher training	419·3
SO/LA2 Scottish Office	Capital expenditure in Scotland on housing by local authorities, new towns, the Scottish Special Housing Association and on schemes financed by the Housing Corporation, and industrial and commercial investment by new towns	487·3
WO/LA1 Welsh Office	Capital expenditure in Wales by local authorities, new towns and the Housing Corporation on roads and transport, housing, schools, further education and teacher training, personal social services, and other environmental services and by the Land Authority for Wales	314·8

* The cash limit is net of receipts, which are expected to exceed capital expenditure in 1986-87.

Personal Income Levels

77. Mr. Leighton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how changes in personal income levels are affecting levels of employment.

Mr. MacGregor: Other things being equal, lower rises in average real pay would mean more jobs in the long term.

EC Budget

Mr. Bellingham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has received notice of the outcome of the United Kingdom's application to the European Court of Justice for interim measures regarding the 1986 Communities budget; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: The president of the European Court of Justice has granted our applicaion for interim measures in terms of the following orders:

"1. The Commission shall implement, until 10 July 1986 or until the date on which the Court delivers its judgment in case 34/86, Council v European Parliament, whichever date shall be the earlier, the budget for the financial year 1986, as regards both payment appropriations and credit appropriations, on the basis of the draft budget established by the Council at its second reading on 27 November 1985, subject to those amendments decided by the Parliament on 12 December 1985, which do not have the effect of increasing non-compulsory expenditure, that is to say the amendments by way of transfer from budget line B 660 to the new lines B6615, 6616 and 6617 and to line 6632 and from budget line B 944 to line A 1 100.

2. In the first call which it makes, following this order, on the United Kingdom for funds relating to the 1986 budget, the Commission shall reduce the amount claimed, on the basis of the budget established by the Council at its second reading, by the amount of any overpayments made by the United Kingdom prior to this order on the basis of the budget declared by the President of the European Parliament on 18 December 1985.

3. Should the Court not deliver its judgment in the aforesaid case 34/86 on or before 10 July 1986, the United Kingdom shall reappear before the Court without delay in order to ascertain whether the Court will maintain the order which it has addressed to the Commission."

The Government welcome the court's judgment, which vindicates their decision to bring an action before the court for interim measures pending judgment on the substantive action against the European Parliament.

The Government will continue to work with their partners to ensure the successful outcome of the main case.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Civil Defence

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to increase the level of local authority grant-aid for civil defence in the light of the implementation of the 1983 Civil Defence Regulations and the control of Industrial Major Accidents Hazards Regulations 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Proposals for the level of civil defence grant will be included in the 1986-87 Supplementary Estimates which are being presented to Parliament today. Local authorities' costs in implementing the Control of Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1985 are not eligible for civil defence grant-aid, but are recoverable from the site controller.

Tamils

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Tamils at present in the United Kingdom are still awaiting process of their applications for asylum; how many have been granted permission to stay to date; how many have been returned; and how many applications have been received from Tamils following the imposition of a visa requirement on 30 May 1985.

Mr. Waddington: Precise figures are not available, but it is estimated that applications for asylum from about 1,250 Sri Lankan citizens, most if not all of whom are likely to be Tamils, are outstanding. In 1985 two Sri Lankan Tamils were granted asylum and about 900 were given leave to enter or remain on an exceptional basis. Only one Tamil whose application was refused has been removed to Sri Lanka, although at least 40 have returned voluntarily; others have been returned to third countries. Since 30 May 1985 about 270 Sri Lankan citizens in this country have applied for asylum.

Uncorroborated Evidence

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been (a) charged and (b) convicted in English courts on the basis of uncorroborated evidence since 1979.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not available but I understand that it is the policy of the Director of Public Prosecutions to advise against such prosecutions.

Homicide

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report a breakdown by sex of the table 4.4 offences currently recorded as homicide by relationship of victim to principal suspect (1974-84) in Home Office "Criminal Statistics of England and Wales 1984" (Cmnd. 9621).

Mr. Mellor: The available information is given in the table.

To provide this breakdown for earlier years would involve disproportionate cost.

• Excluding homicides of police or prison officer and those attributed to terrorism.

Merseyside Police Authority

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his inspectorate has investigated the geographical distribution of police manpower in the Merseyside police authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Deployment of manpower was included in the inspection of the Merseyside police which took place in November 1985, although there was no specific investigation as described by the hon. Member.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria his inspectorate uses to ensure that the terms of section 4*(a)* of the Police Act 1964 —maintenance of an adequate and efficient police force —are being met by the Merseyside police authority.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Under section 38 of the Police Act 1964, Her Majesty's Inspectors of constabulary have a duty to inspect and report to my right hon. Friend on the efficiency of police forces. Inspections bring out those points relevant to a police authority's responsibilities under section 4 of the Police Act 1964 for maintaining an adequate and efficient force and for providing buildings, vehicles, clothing and other equipment.

Coastal Resorts (Life-saving Appliances)

Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to amend section 234 of the Public Health Act 1936 to make mandatory the provision by local authorities of life-saving appliances at coastal resorts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We are unaware of any reason for considering such a step. In the past it has not been thought appropriate for the Government to seek to influence local authorities over how they exercise their existing discretion under the 1936 Act.

Cinemas Act 1985 (Licences)

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has about the relative costs incurred by the Greater London council as compared with other local authorities in issuing licences under the Cinemas Act 1985.

Mr. Mellor: The only information available to us derives from a survey which we undertook into costs incurred by local authorities in the financial year 1983-84. This indicated that the average cost incurred by 12 local authorities outside Greater London was £119 while that incurred by the GLC was at least four times as great (making allowance for applications submitted as a result of the coming into force of the Cinematograph (Amendment) Act 1982 which were either withdrawn or refused).

Coaches

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will discuss with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis the problems caused to the police arising from coaches parking and using random routes in London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have consulted the Metropolitan police in the course of the review of parking and access for coaches in London being conducted by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. The review's report upon which we will seek comments, is to be published shortly.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report for the latest year for which information is available, for each right hon. and hon. Member, the arithmetic mean in days that his Department took to reply to letters.

Mr. Douglas Hurd: My Department received over 29,000 letters in 1985 for ministerial reply, the great majority of them from right hon. and hon. Members. To calculate the average time taken to handle correspondence for each right hon. and hon. Member would involve disproportionate expense.

A mean figure for the Department as a whole is of only limited value because of the wide range of cases. For the second half of 1985 it was 54 days, reflecting the fact that in a significant proportion of immigration cases final replies are not sent for a number of months while inquiries are being pursued or while an appeal is outstanding. Of the final replies sent in the second half of 1985, 34 per cent. went within a month of the arrival of the initial letter and a further 37 per cent. within two months.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Metropolitan police officers have been dismissed, required to resign or reduced in rank for each year from 1982 to 1984; and how many officers resigned voluntarily while under investigation for disciplinary matters or after disciplinary charges had been preferred.

Mr. Hurd: The information is as follows:

	1982	1983	1984
Dismissed	8	10	14

The figures are published in the annual reports of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Sunday Trading

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what have been the average fines for convictions for Sunday trading in each of the last three years.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 13 March 1986, c.535]:

Records available to me, which may be incomplete, show the average fine imposed by magistrates courts in England and Wales for offences relating to Sunday trading as £44 in 1982, £100 in 1983 and £145 in 1984. Corresponding information for 1985 is not yet available.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

EC Regional Development Fund

Sir Richard Body asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has about grants, aids or subsidies from the French Government which are available to United Kingdom companies wishing to move to the area around Calais and the extent to which further assistance can be given out of the EEC regional development fund.

Mr. Alan Clark: United Kingdom companies may qualify for various forms of assistance offered by the French authorities depending on the type of project or activity which the companies wish to undertake. We understand that the Calais area is covered by the French Government's system of regional aid and that United Kingdom companies may be eligible for such aid if the various conditions of the system are met. It is, of course, for the French Government to decide which regionally-aided industry projects are submitted to the European Commission from this and other eligible regions in France for a contribution from the European regional development Fund (ERDF) towards the public expenditure cost of the domestic aid; and it is then for the Commission to decide which applications for ERDF contributions are accepted under the rules of the fund.

Insider Dealing

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action is being undertaken by his Department's investigating officers into allegations of organised insider dealing involving offshore companies on the stock exchange; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The activities of any Department's investigating officers are limited to persons who are identifiable and willing to assist with inquiries. Clause 147 of the Financial Services Bill proposes greatly to strengthen the powers available for investigating suspected insider dealing. My Department is taking part in discussions aimed at furthering international co-operation between regulatory authorities, which is an important factor in dealing with the abuse to which my hon. Friend alludes.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report for the latest year for which information is available for each hon. and right hon. Member, the arithmetic mean in days that his Department took to reply to letters.

Mr. Channon: The full information which the hon. Gentleman requests is not available other than at disproportionate cost.

In general, however, replies by the Secretary of State to letters from right hon. and hon. Members are dispatched within 10 to 15 working days from receipt of the original letter.

Consumer Credit Licensing

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why the Office of Fair Trading has asked for an extension of £800,000 on its cash limit for computerising consumer credit licensing; and if he will specify what equipment is to be used for this project.

Mr. Howard: The computerisation of the consumer credit licensing operation is a matter for the Director General of Fair Trading, and I will ask him to write to the hon. Member.

Toys (Noise)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has made any study of the implications for consumer safety of the level of noise emanating from children's toys; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: My Department's safety research section has not undertaken any study on this subject nor to the best of its knowledge has any other organisation. Should the hon. Member wish to make specific proposals for research into noisy toys, I shall be glad to consider them.

Closures (Northern Region)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the number of closures in the northern region notified to him in each year since 1979.

Mr. Howard: The information is not available in the exact form requested. The only readily available data were published in British Business, 18 January 1985, which is available in the Library.

Business Failures

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many business failures have been reported in each year since 1979.

Mr. Howard: The information is as follows:

Insolvencies

Year	England and Wales		Scotland
	Company liquidations	Bankruptcies	Company liquidations	Sequestrations (equivalent of bankruptcies)
1979	4,537	3,500	238	106
1980	6,890	4,038	379	150
1981	8,596	5,151	438	181
1982	12,067	5,700	503	213

Year	England and Wales		Scotland
	Company liquidations	Bankruptcies	Company liquidations	Sequestrations (equivalent of bankruptcies)
1983	13,406	7,032	521	282
1984	13,721	8,229	523	292
1985*	14,895	6,772	537	298

* Provisional.

Bankruptcy and sequestration figures include receiving orders and administration orders and the total is the net number of cases administered after consolidations and rescisions. They relate to all individuals and partnerships and it is estimated that unincorporated businesses account for between 75 and 80 per cent. of the total.

Liquidations

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many firms in (a) the west midlands and (b) the black country area of the west midlands have gone into liquidation since May 1979; and what was the percentage change over the seven years prior to May 1979 in the two areas, respectively.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 17 March 1986]: I regret that official figures of company liquidations are not available by area. The provisional total number of bankruptcies administered in the years 1979 to 1985 inclusive by county courts in the whole of the west midlands county was 2,009 and in the black country area 696. The black country area is defined as that part of the west midlands county covered by the courts in Dudley, Walsall, Wolverhampton and West Bromwich, that is omitting those in Birmingham, Coventry and Stourbridge. In west midlands the annual average was 56 per cent. higher than in the two years 1977-78 and in the black country it was 57 per cent. Comparisons are not given with the previous seven years because of a break in continuity at the end of 1976. The figures relate to all individuals and partnerships; for England and Wales as a whole, unincorporated businesses account for between 75 and 80 per cent. of the total.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Local Authorities (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which local authorities have made representations to his Department concerning their capital expenditure allocations for 1986-87.

Mr. Dunn: Written representations have been received from the authorities listed.

Avon
Berkshire
Brent
Bromley
Cambridgeshire
Cleveland
Cumbria
Derbyshire
Doncaster
Dudley
Ealing
East Sussex

Nursery Schools

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many nursery schools there are in Lincolnshire; how many pupils they have; and what percentage of the total nursery school age population that represents.

Mr. Dunn: There were four maintained nursery schools in Lincolnshire in January 1985 attended by 335 full and part-time pupils. This represents 2·5 per cent. of the estimated population aged three and four years in Lincolnshire.

Local Authorities (Education Expenditure)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), 4 March, Official Report, column 112, which local education authorities did not raise their general education spending in real terms between 1982-83 and 1983-84; and if he will indicate the extent to which these local education authorities deviated from the average national rise in spending.

Mr. Dunn: Local education authorities in England spent the same amount, in real terms, in 1982-83 as in 1983-84. The extent to which individual authorities spent less than the average is given in the following table.

Authority	Real terms reduction net expenditure between 1982-83 and 1983-84 Percentage

Higher Education Policy

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the effect of Her Majesty's Government's higher education policy on the morale of university staff and the quality of education.

Mr. Walden: Since May 1985 my right hon. Friend has received more than 1,900 representations about higher education policies generally and over 2,500 others specifically about the pay of university staff. Most have argued for additional funding for higher education so as to maintain and improve the quality of higher education, access to it, or the pay and morale of staff working in higher education.

Student Awards

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total or estimated total cost to parents of assessed contributions to mandatory student grants for each year since 1979-80 in (a) cash terms and (b) 1985-86 prices; and if he will provide forecasts for future years.

Mr. Walden: The information is as follows:

Mandatory Awards (England and Wales)
Assessed Parental Contributions (£ million)

	Academic Year	Cash	1985-86
Actual	1979-80	84	135
	1980-81	98	136
	1981-82	127	158
	1982-83	155	181
	1983-84	171	190
Estimated	1984-85	215	228
Forecast	1985-86	252	252
	1986-87	267	257

Note: Repricing is based on the RPI as at September of each academic year. The RPI annual increase to September 1986 is assumed to be 4 per cent.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number of students on discretionary awards or local authority bursaries as well as the numbers of students who receive no award who will not receive the £36 compensation as a result of the proposed changes in student entitlement to welfare benefits.

Mr. Walden: Students studying from home will be largely unaffected by the proposed changes in entitlement to welfare benefits, so it is proposed to limit compensation through the student grant to award holders living away from home. The amount of compensation to be paid to mandatory award holders has yet to be finally decided. There are approximately 70,000 award holders from England and Wales in higher education who live at home, and will therefore receive no compensation. In the case of students on discretionary awards and bursaries, it will be for the award-making bodies to decide what compensation should be paid. There are also some 90,000 students who could be affected by the proposals and who study without any award, but it is not known how many of them study away from home.

Physical Science Teachers

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what proportions of secondary school teachers of physical sciences in England and Wales are estimated to be (a) over 50 years of age and (b) over 40 years of age;

(2) what proportions of secondary school mathematics teachers in England and Wales are estimated to be (a) over 50 years of age and (b) over 40 years of age.

Mr. Chris Patten: The estimates given are derived from a survey of a sample of maintained secondary schools in England carried out by this Department in 1984. Corresponding information about Welsh secondary schools is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

England full-time teachers teaching named subject in maintained secondary schools, 1984

	Estimated percentage who were
	50 years of age and over	40 years of age and over
Mathematics	18	44
Chemistry*	13	40
Physics*	14	42

* Some physics and chemistry teaching is also carried out by teachers of "General Science" or "Other Science" where these subjects cannot be separately distinguished.

Dyslexia

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report those local education authorities in England which recognise dyslexia as a malady requiring special attention.

Mr. Dunn: The Department does not collect this information.

GCSE

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what provision has been made in extra rate support grant or education support grant for local education authorities to purchase new books and equipment as a result of the changes in the examination system to the general certificate of secondary education;

(2) what extra resources have been allocated to local education authorities for the introduction of the general certificate of secondary education.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which my right hon. Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) on 13 March at column 542.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to the proportion of teachers who have completed training for the general certificate of secondary education examination.

Mr. Chris Patten: The programme of phase 2 of GCSE training for subject representatives is now well under way. From information available to the Department and the Secondary Examination Council it would appear that attendance at these seminars has been of the order of 50 to 60 per cent. My right hon. Friend, in his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr Thompson) on 13 March at column 542, announced further measures designed to ensure that all teachers of the GCSE received appropriate training for the new examination courses.

Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has received from local authorities which are having difficulties in implementing the new general certificate of secondary education examination.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Department has received a number of representations from local education authorities about the introduction of the GCSE raising, in particular, concerns about the training programme and resources for schools. My right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North, (Mr. Thompson) on 13 March, at column 542. set out three measures in direct response to these requests.

Somerset University

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department recognises Somerset university, trading as Somerset University Independent of Ilminster; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: This institution is not among those empowered to award degrees by Royal Charter or Act of Parliament. Independent further education establishments which cater only for students over 16 are not required to register with this Department and the Department has no statutory control over them. The Government deplores any trade in bogus degrees and proposals for possible action to curtail the activities of operators in this field are under consideration.

Adult and Continuing Education

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on adult and continuing education.

Mr. Walden: I cannot add further to my reply of 4 February at columns 128-29 to the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) and other hon. Members.

PRIME MINISTER

Good Neighbourliness Campaign

Q23. Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister if she will sponsor a national campaign of good neighbourliness to help the aged, the frail, the disabled and the lonely and particularly those who live alone; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I am always happy to promote good neighbourliness, but experience suggests that it can most effectively be developed by local action. Our policy therefore is to encourage social services departments to draw on and develop all the resources available in the community to assist people who need support, including the support that may be provided by vigilant and caring neighbours.

Disabled People

Q119. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister if she will meet leaders of the main disablement organisations to discuss proposals for further legislation to safeguard the interests of disabled people; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: My ministerial colleagues meet leaders of the main disablement organisations from time to time, and indeed my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services did so yesterday, to discuss the Social Security Bill which is at present before Parliament. We are always happy to consider any suggestions, on legislation or other matters, which they put forward, but I do not believe a further meeting is now necessary.

Mr. Ian MacGregor (Memoirs)

Q151. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will seek to obtain for the library of 10 Downing street a copy of Mr. Ian MacGregor's memoirs; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I understand no such book has yet been published.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Prime Minister if the statement by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on 10 March that the Anglo-Irish agreement was a bulwark against a United Ireland represents the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

The Prime Minister: The Government hope and believe that Northern Ireland will remain part of the United Kingdom.

Chancellor Kohl

Mr. Freeson asked the Prime Minister when she next expects to meet Chancellor Kohl of West Germany.

The Prime Minister: At the Tokyo economic summit from 4 to 6 May.

Engagements

Mr. Rogers asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 March.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 March.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 March.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Abdul Haq

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement about her meeting with the Afghan resistance leader Abdul Haq.

The Prime Minister: Mr. Abdul Haq gave me an account of the brave activities of the resistance in the war against the occupation of Afghanistan. He emphasised that the resistance would continue until the Afghan people were free to enjoy the right of self-determination and the refugees could return in honour and safety to their homes. I made clear the Government's full support for the efforts of the Afghan people to free themselves of foreign occupation as well as for the efforts of the United Nations Secretary General's representative to find a negotiated settlement on the basis of successive United Nations resolutions. I also made clear our belief that the key to such a settlement remains the withdrawal of the Soviet troops. Until then we will continue to give what help we can to the victims of the occupation.

WALES

Farms

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many farms run on a full-time basis there are in Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: 12,416 holdings were classified as whole-time in June 1985.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has had pressing for a delay of one year in the introduction of the general certificate of secondary education in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Representations have been received from one local education authority, the local authorities committee of the WJEC, the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association, a county group of secondary headteachers, a county branch of the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers, the governing bodies of eight secondary schools, a federation of parent teacher associations, one individual parent teacher association and nine individuals.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate for each local education authority in Wales of the cost of providing new materials for the new general certificate of secondary education examination courses; and by what mechanism he proposes to make new funds available to these authorities to meet this additional spending requirement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Educational provision is for individual local education authorities to determine on the basis of local needs and priorities. However, given the importance of this reform, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science announced on 13 March at column 542, that we propose to use the education support grant mechanism to assist secondary schools with purchase of books and equipment.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied that adequate provision has been made in Wales for retraining teachers prior to September for starting to teach courses leading to the general certificate of secondary education examinations in 1988.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Yes. The programme of in-service training established by the WJEC is currently under way. That programme is to receive further support, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science announced on 13 March, at column 542.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what indications he has recieved from the Welsh Joint Education Committee concerning the ability of the education sector in Wales to cope with the new general certificate of secondary education examinations in 1988.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The local authorities committee of the WJEC has called for the postponement of the introduction of the GCSE by one year. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science made clear on 13 March, at column 542, that is not an option.

Examinations

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has received from the Manpower Services Commission for changes in the curriculum of examinations in Wales; and if he will make a statement as to the role of the Manpower Services Commission in this context.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: None.

Voluntary Services Councils

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales, how much funding is provided by his Department in the current year for each of the county voluntary services councils in Wales, respectively; and whether there is any stipulation in making such grants that any services need to be provided for community and town councils within their area.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Funding approved for 1985-86 is as follows:

Organisation	Grant £
Clwyd Voluntary Services Council	57,282
Dyfed Association of Voluntary Services	63,391
Glamorgan Community Services Council	17,395
Gwent Community Services Council	31,642
Gwynedd Rural Council	73,816
Powys Rural Council	61,232
South Glamorgan Intervol	13,869
West Glamorgan Community Services Council	32,827

The provision of services for community and town councils is not a condition of grant.

Workplace Cancer Screening

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will allocate additional funds to Welsh health authorities for the purpose of introducing a comprehensive workplace cancer screening service throughout Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Cervical cytology is at present the only population based cancer screening service. It is managed by district health authorities, which decide how the service can be provided most effectively. Four hundred thousand pounds of central funding has been earmarked for the development of cancer screening services in Wales in 1986-87 and we are considering with health authorities how this money should be used.

EC (Price Proposals)

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to visit Brussels during the next few weeks to discuss the implications of the European Economic Community price proposals for Welsh agriculture; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to visit Brussels in the immediate future. The United Kingdom representation in discussions with European Economic Community Ministers on the common agricultural policy will take full account of the interests of Wales.

Fishing Industry (Cardigan Bay)

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the state of the fishing industry in the Cardigan bay catchment area.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Lobsters are the most important species for the local fishing industry in Cardigan bay. Measures have been introduced since 1981 aimed at conserving stocks of lobsters and scallops, including those in Cardigan bay. The industry will benefit also from improvements to harbour facilities at Aberystwyth, which will enable more fishing vessels to use the harbour and better marketing arrangements to be made there. My right hon. Friend has approved contributions of £100,000 by the Welsh Office and £125,000 by the Development Board for Rural Wales towards the cost of the work at Aberystwyth, which is expected to be finished this summer.

Landfill Sites

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report for each district council in Wales the number of landfill sites currently in use for controlled tipping.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is given in the following table:

Local authority	Number of local authority sites with council resolution	Number of private sites licenced by local authority

Schools Inspectors

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those schools in Wales whose in-depth reports have been carried out by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools since these reports have been made public; and if he will distinguish between primary and secondary schools and give the date of publication.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is given in the following tables:

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the number of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools employed in Wales for each of the last five years.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is as follows:

Number of HMIs (all grades) as at 31 December

Year	Number
1981	54
1982	51
1983	47
1984	55
1985	51

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what action his Department takes to monitor the implementaton of recommendations made by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools in their in-depth reports of conditions and practices in Welsh schools.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The arrangements applying since 1 January 1983 for following up reports made by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools are set out in Welsh Office circular 11/83, a copy of which is in the Library. Further to that circular, the Department wrote to all local education authorities in Wales on 2 July 1985 informing them that the response period to reports on maintained establishments would be specified separately for each report and would not be less than three months.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the current salary scales of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The current salary scales are:

Grade 4 (HM Chief Inspector) £	Grade 5 (HM Staff Inspector) £	Grade 6 (HM Inspector) £
27,584	20,964	17,000
28,334	22,387	17,804
29,084	23,341	19,204
	24,296	20,796
	25,533	22,926

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has about the number of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools in Wales who gained, at the advanced level of the General Certificate of Education examination (a) three grade As, (b) two grade As, (c) one grade A and (d) no grade A.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not available.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the number of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools in Wales who have had (a) no experience of teaching in primary schools, (b) up to three years teaching experience in primary schools, (c) three to six years teaching in primary schools and (d) more than six years teaching in primary schools.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The informaton in respect of all grades of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools currently employed in Wales is as follows:

	Number of HMIs
(a) No experience of teaching in primary schools	47
(b) Up to three years experience	1
(c) Three to six years experience	1
(d) More than six years experience	4

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the number of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools in Wales who have had (a) no experience of teaching in secondary schools, (b) up to three years teaching experience in secondary schools, (c) three to six years teaching in secondary schools and (d) more than six years teaching in secondary schools.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information in respect of all grades of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools currently employed in Wales is as follows:

	Number of HMIs
(a) No experience of teaching in secondary schools	8
(b) Up to three years experience	9
(c) Three to six years experience	11
(d) More than six years experience	25

Dyslexia

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report those education authorities in Wales which recognise dyslexia as a malady requiring special attention.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Department does not collect this information.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report for the year ended 31 December 1985, for each right hon. and hon. Member representing constituencies in Wales, the longest number of working days that his Department took to reply to letters.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

Local Government Act 1974 (Review)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has responded to the third review of part III of the Local Government Act 1974 conducted by the Commission for Local Administration for Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I have issued my response to the commission and have placed copies in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Human Rights

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what aid previously provided has been cancelled, and in which countries, because of human rights violations since 1979.

Mr. Raison: Human rights considerations comprise one factor taken into account in deciding how bilateral aid funds should be allocated. Since 1979 we have provided no new aid to the Governments of Vietnam and Afghanistan because of human rights violations and other related issues. We have, however, continued to provide assistance to Afghan refugees through international and British voluntary agencies and through training in Britain, and we have contributed to United Nations programmes in support of Indo-Chinese refugees, including the civilian population of the Thai/Cambodian border who have fled from Vietnamese occupying forces.

Lomé Convention (Aid)

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will provide a list of the countries receiving aid or loans under the Lomé conventions of the EEC in the financial years since 1979, showing the moneys involved.

Mr. Raison: The information requested is as follows:

ENERGY

Sizewell Inquiry

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether the whole of the report of the Sizewell inquiry will be published simultaneously.

Mr. Goodlad: Yes.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he intends to place in the Library a copy of the interdepartmental review of measures to increase energy efficiency for low-income householders, as recommended in paragraph 24 of the eighth report of the Energy Committee, session 1984-85.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) on 10 March at column 659.

Chapelcross and Calder Hall

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate had sight of all relevant reports and accompanying correspondence from Mr. Peter Phelan before signing off the long-term safety reviews for Chapelcross and Calder Hall power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad [pursuant to his reply, 4 March 1986, c. 85-86]: I am advised by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate that the responsibility for making a safety case in respect of any matter concerned with a licensed nuclear installation rests with the licensee. Any report which contains the licensee's safety case must contain adequate technical and scientific justification of his arguments, and all references must be identified and made available to the NII. Where a licensee uses consultants to assist him in carrying out an appropriate analysis, he is required to make available only those documents or correspondence necessary to support his safety case. The NII would not expect to receive any copy of correspondence between a licensee and an individual member of the consultant's staff unless it formed a necessary part of a reference. The assessment submitted by BNFL to the NII contained no reference or correspondence which can be identified as arising from Mr. Peter Phelan.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate has taken to satisfy itself of the capacity of Chapelcross and Calder Hall nuclear power stations to withstand seismological shocks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad [pursuant to his reply, 4 March 1986, c. 85-86]: I am advised by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate that it asked BNFL to submit assessments of the effect of seismic events on the nuclear power stations at Calder Hall and Chapelcross as part of BNFL's comprehensive long term safety reviews. Because of the special expertise required to analyse seismic events and their potential effects on reactor structures, BNFL employed consultants to assist them in this task. Similarly, the NII has employed its own independent consultants in order to satisfy itself about the adequacy of BNFL's assessments.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will specify the magnitude of seismic events expected to occur at least once in a nominal 40-year operating life at Chapelcross or Calder Hall :

(2) if he will specify the most severe seismic event expected to occur at Chapelcross or Calder Hall in a nominal 40-year operating life.

Mr. Goodlad: [pursuant to his reply, 4 March 1986, c. 85-86]: I am advised by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate that seismic events are qualified in terms of their severity and their frequency of occurrence. Earthquakes which would be sufficiently severe to damage Calder Hall or Chapelcross are extremely rare. The probability of an earthquake reduces very rapidly as its magnitude increases. It is estimated that the peak free field horizontal acceleration which would occur in a normal 40-year life for these stations is about 0·035g.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will specify the maximum mangnitude of seismic events which, in the light of recent research studies, could be expected to permit the nuclear reactors at Chapelcross and Calder Hall to survive, be safely shut down and subsequently be maintained in safe condition.

Mr. Goodlad: [pursuant to his reply, 4 March 1986, c. 85-86] I am advised by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate that the seismic structural assessments carried out by BNFL for the Calder Hall and Chapelcross reactor demonstrate that the reactor could be safely shut down and maintained in a safe condition following an earthquake with a peak free field horizontal acceleration of 0·11g although some damage to non-essential service buildings could occur.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Health and Social Services

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table showing separately for (i) hospital and community health services, (ii) family practitioner services and (iii) social services, actual and planned expenditure in Northern Ireland for the years 1978-79 to 1988-89 in (a) cash prices, (b) cost terms and (c) volume terms, and showing the percentage increases over 1978-79 on a basis consistent with table 2.12 of Cmnd. 9702-II.

Mr. Needham: The following tables contain the information requested. The expenditure figures shown are net of patient charges, as are those in table 2.12 of Cmnd. 9702-II.

Expenditure on central health and miscellaneous services is excluded.

* In Northern Ireland, the services are administered by health and social services boards and presentation of separate hospital and community health services and personal social services figures therefore involve a calculated attribution of certain costs, especially those for common services.

† No separate record is maintained of pay and price movements within the health service in Northern Ireland. The indices used are those calculated by the Department of Health and Social Security from English data, and which are available only to 1984-85.

‡ Percentage increase in figures adjusted by NHS factors covers the years 1978-79 to 1984-85 only.

Asylum Seekers (Benefits)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many asylum seekers are currently in receipt of benefits; and what has been the cost for the last two years.

Mr. Needham: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Intimidation

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what protection against intimidation by extremist and paramilitary organisations is being given to members of health and social services and education and library boards attending meetings and other duties; and whether he is satisfied that the boards' functions are being properly performed.

Mr. Scott: It would not be sensible to describe measures taken to protect individuals. My right hon. Friend is satisfied that the boards' functions are being properly performed.

Harland and Wolff

Mr. Trotter asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much assistance from public funds has been received by Harland and Wolff since 1 April 1985 (a) by way of payments from the intervention fund, (b) by way of interest-free unsecured loans and (c) otherwise.

Dr. Boyson: Since 1 April 1985 Harland and Wolff has received the following assistance from public funds:

(a) £4,250,000 in payments from the intervention fund;

(b) £31,384,868 in interest-free unsecured loans; and

(c) £1,549,888 of standard regional grants.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Hypothermia

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the figures indicating the number of people in the United Kingdom who have died from hypothermia each year since 1978.

Mr. Whitney: Information on the numbers of deaths with any mention of hypothermia on the death certificate, irrespective of whether it did or did not appear as the underlying cause of death is not available for Northern Ireland prior to 1985. The table, therefore, shows figures for Great Britain from 1978 to 1985, and for the United Kingdom for 1985.

Medical Posts (Vacancies)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has about current vacant positions in the medical posts of consultant, and related appointments, nurses and other associated medical appointments within health districts in inner London, by district.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that information is not collected centrally on vacancies by district health authorities except for consultant posts in teaching districts.

The latest available such figures are as follows:

Inner London District Health Authority	Consultant posts without permanent holders	Occupied by locums	Not occupied by locums
Hampstead	1·0	1·0	0·0

Community Homes

Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many community homes with education there are in (a) England and (b) Wales; and what was the equivalent figure in 1980;

(2) how many community homes with education places are available on average per local authority possessing a social service function in England and Wales; and what was the equivalent figure in 1980.

Mr. Whitney: The information available is given in the table.

Family Practitioner Committees

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply of Wednesday 15 January, Official Report, column 606, whether the statutory auditors have issued reports on inadequate provision for internal audit in any further family practitioner committees.

Mr. Hayhoe: Further to the family practitioner committees identified in my reply to the hon. Member on 15 January, at columns 606-7, statutory auditors have issued reports on the inadequate provision for internal audit at the following committees:

Barnet FPC
Hillingdon FPC
Redbridge and Waltham Forest FPC
City and East London FPC
Croydon FPC

An additional sum of £258,000 has been made available to FPCs in 1986-87, on a selective basis, for the development of internal audit arrangements.

Hospitals

Sir Gerard Vaughan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hospital in-patients and out-patients received treatment in 1978 in the Oxfordshire health region and in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is given in the table.

NHS hospitals, Oxford Regional Health Authority

	1978	1984
In-patient cases	247,943	284,583
Day cases	23,146	29,931
Out-patient new attendances	345,740	375,175

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of paying supplementary benefit to students in respect of the first three days of their holiday; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Unemployed claimants of supplementary benefit normally receive benefit from two days after their "signing day", which is usually designated according to the first letter of the claimant's surname. The period between the date of claim and the official signing day will therefore vary and no reliable estimate is possible of he cost of paying students from their date of claim. In cases of hardship, payments can be made under the urgent cases regulations during the period before the first benefit payment is made.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average annual cost of caring for a person in a mental handicap hospital.

Mr. Whitney: The average annual cost per in-patient in National Health Service mental handicap hospitals was £11,850 in 1984-85, the latest year for which this information is available.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many readmissions have taken place in hospitals for mentally handicapped people in each of the last six years; and for each year, if he will give a breakdown of readmissions according to the following age-bands: (a) under 16 years, (b) 16 to 19 years, (c) 20 to 24 years, (d) 25 to 30 years, (e) 30 to 40 years, (f) 40 to 50 years, (g) 50 to 60 years and (h) over 60 years.

Mr. Whitney: Information in the precise age groups requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The readily available information is given in the table.

Birthweights (Flight Paths)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies have been made of the birthweight of babies born to mothers living close to flight paths near major airports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr Whitney: We are not aware of any studies that have addressed this issue.

Seat Belts

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated annual saving to the National Health Service resulting from the compulsory wearing of seat belts in each year from 1983 to the latest available date.

Mr. Whitney: It is not yet clear whether the introduction of compulsory seat belts will actually reduce the costs to the National Health Service of treating road accident victims. There are undoubtedly savings where the wearing of seat belts has lessened injuries, but conversely NHS costs are increased where patients who would previously have died before reaching hospital survive to require—often prolonged—treatment. Some types of injury to the neck and thorax, which involve longer treatment, have become commoner.

In 1983, the first full year after the legislation took effect, the cost to the National Health Service of treating road accident victims was £108 million, £2 million higher than the previous year. 1984 figures are not yet available.

Traffic Casualties (Treatment Charges)

Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the revenue accrued to the National Health Service under sections 154 to 156 of the Road Traffic Act 1972 in each year since 1982 to the latest available date.

Mr. Whitney: The payments in question are due under sections 154 and 155 of the Road Traffic Act 1972. The annual accounts of health authorities in England show total income from this source as:

1982-83	5,894
1983-84	6,950
1984-85	7,324

Hip Replacement Operations

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hip replacement operations there were in Derbyshire and Amber Valley (a) in 1978 and (b) for the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. Friend the information he seeks. It is not collected centrally. My hon. Friend may wish to write to the chairmen of the North and Southern Derbyshire district health authorities for the information requested.

Hon. Member's Question (Delay)

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his Answer of 13 March concerning the question of the hon. Member for Crawley of 18 February, if he will give the reasons for the delay in answering the honourable Member's question.

Mr. Fowler: I replied to my hon. Friend yesterday, but I regret any delay.

Circulars and Regulations

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the draft circulars and regulations on the single payments and weekly requirements schemes including No. RDL0486.

Mr. Newton: Copies of the papers on the proposals to amend the single payment regulations which have been sent to the Social Security Advisory Committee — including the draft regulations — were placed in the Library on 24 February 1986. On the same day a copy was also sent, for information, to all the Department's local offices under cover of a letter numbered RD/LO 4/86. It is not the Department's practice to publish such internal communications.

Following the Government's consideration of any comments the Social Security Advisory Committee may make on the proposals and the laying of amending regulations before Parliament, guidance on them will be issued to local adjudication officers in an S circular, a copy of which will be placed in the Library.

DHAs (Chairmanships)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which individuals or organisations outside his Department have been consulted or have had sight of the current nominees for district health authority chairmanships; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the manner in which health authorities have spent the money saved by means of submitting laundry, domestic and cleaning services to competition tender.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is not collected centrally.

NHS (Private Contractors)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will publish the latest information he has about the number of (a) laundry, (b) domestic and (c) cleaning contracts submitted for competitive tender by health authorities, the proportion of each awarded in-house and to outside companies and the savings resulting therefrom;

(2) what were the cumulative savings at the end of 1985 made by health authorities as a result of submitting laundry, domestic and cleaning services to competitive tender.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

SCOTLAND

Grants

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all specific type grants paid by his Department to local authorities, showing the size of each grant, which were hypothecated to any individual services or where local authorities had to bid for specific grants.

Mr. Rifkind: The information based on 1985-86 estimated provision is as follows. All specific type grants to be paid in the current financial year are hypothecated to individual services. All grants require applications from local authorities.

Parking Fines

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many persons in each region were charged in 1983 and 1984 as a consequence of failure to pay parking fines within the prescribed period;

(2) how many persons in Scotland in each region paid parking fines in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. John MacKay: Almost all parking offences are dealt with by the issue of fixed penalty notices under the relevant statutory provisions. Figures on penalties paid and cases referred for prosecution are available only for these fixed penalty notices as a whole, not specifically for the 80 per cent of the notices which are issued for parking offences. The available information, which is by police force area, is as follows:

Tourism

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to seek to spread around Scotland the potential tourist benefit deriving from the 1986 Commonwealth Games; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The XIII Commonwealth Games will make a major contribution to Scotland's economy in 1986 and the Scottish Tourist Board estimates that almost £50 million will be directly injected into the economy. Spin-off benefits for the tourism industry are expected to last for a much longer period.

Some of the competitions associated with the Games will be held out with Edinburgh and many visitors will be accommodated outside Edinburgh during the Games, and these factors alone will help to spread the benefits. The Scottish Tourist Board, as the Government's main vehicle for the promotion of tourism in Scotland, is moreover prepared to support any operator intending to promote holiday packages designed to disperse Games' visitors throughout Scotland. The onus, however, is on individual operators and local area tourist boards to ensure that the attractions of their particular are a or facilities are suitably publicised in the Edinburgh area both in the run up to, and during, the Games. The attractions of Scotland, including the Games, to visitors already feature in the Scottish Tourist Board's domestic and overseas promotion literature.

Farms

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many farms run on a full-time basis there are in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: At the June 1985 agricultural census in Scotland 16,000 farms were estimated to be of full-time business size.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report for the latest year for which information is available, for each right hon. and hon. Member with constituencies in Scotland, the arithmetic mean in days that his Department took to reply to letters.

Mr. Rifkind: The information requested by the hon. Member could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. I would, however, refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr Younger) to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on Monday 15 July 1985 at column 37.

Hypothermia

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, pursuant to his answers to the hon. Member for Dundee, East of 29 January, Official Report, columns 550-2 and 10 February, Official Report, columns 343-4; he will give figures to show, for the years 1975 to 1980 inclusive, the numbers of deaths in each year with a mention of hypothermia on the death certificate; and if he will break down the figures by age group and by month of the year.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Deaths with any mention of hypothermia, by age group and month, Scotland

Forth Bridge

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide his latest estimate of the amount and proportion of the Forth bridge debt which arises from the inclusion of bridge approach roads in the debt.

Mr. Ancram: The approach roads originally cost £5·7 million, out of a total cost for bridge and roads of £19·7 million. After taking account of a proportionate share of the Government and local authority grants made available at the time, £4·2 million or 28·8 per cent. of the debt was attributable to the roads. The total outstanding debt has of course increased to around £21 million, but the proportion attributable to the roads remains the same.

Financial Services (Employment)

Mr. Fletcher asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were employed in the financial services sector in Scotland in 1979 and 1985; and if he will make a statement on employment prospects in this sector.

Mr. Rifkind: The number of employees in employment in Scotland in division 8 of the standard industrial classification—which covers banking, finance, insurance, business services and leasing—was 124,500 in September 1979 and 149,000 in September 1985. Up-to-date employment estimates for the financial services sector alone in Scotland are not readily available. Employment prospects in the sector as a whole are generally good with some further growth possible in the years ahead.

Scottish Development Agency

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the budget of the Scottish Development Agency for 1986-87; and how this compares in real terms with (a) its original budget for 1985-86 and (b) its estimated outturn expenditure for 1985-86.

Mr. Allan Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986, c. 372]: The agency's gross provision for 1986-87, which comprises its gross grant-in-aid and its provision for industrial investment, is £136 million subject to parliamentary approval. This is equivalent to £130 million at 1985-86 prices and compares with (a) equivalent provision for 1985-86 of £128 million notified to the agency in August 1985 and (b) forecast outturn expenditure in 1985-86 of £132 million. The forecast additional expenditure in 1985-86 will be financed by additional receipts.

Private Woodlands (Grants)

Mr. John asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of expenditure on grants to private woodland owners in (a) 1985-86 and (b) 1986-87 under (i) the forestry grant scheme, (ii) dedication schemes and (iii) the broadleaved woodlands grant scheme.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 10 March 1986, c. 373]: The Forestry Commission's best estimates, at this stage, of expenditure on grants to private woodland owners in 1985-86 and 1986-87 are as follows:

	1985-86 (£ million)*	1986-87 (£ million)
Forestry Grant Scheme	4·70	4·25
Dedication Schemes	†1·62	‡1·55
Broadleaved Woodland Grant Scheme	0·03	1·00

Notes:

* The expenditure for 1985-86 includes arrears of grants (£0·1 million) from the previous year, arising from the retrospective increases in grant rates announced in July 1985.

† Includes £1·33 million for annual management grant payments.

‡ Includes £1·30 million for annual management grant payments.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Afghanistan

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made in the United Nations relating to the annexation by the Soviet Union of a strip of territory from Northern Afghanistan.

Mr. Eggar: We are not aware that the Soviet Union has annexed any part of Afghanistan, but we have certainly made our views clear about the Soviet occupation of that country. We have voted for all seven United Nations General Assembly resolutions calling for the withdrawal of foreign troops, the restoration of Afghanistan's independence and non-aligned character, the right of the Afghan people to self-determination and the return of refugees in safety and honour. We fully support the efforts of the United Nations Secretary General to find a peaceful settlement on this basis. The withdrawal of Soviet troops remains the key to peace.

Alliance of Soviet Solidarists

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's embassy in Moscow takes to monitor the activities of the Russian political organisation Alliance of Soviet Solidarists.

Mr. Eggar: The organisation referred to, commonly known as the NTS, is a Russian emigré body with its headquarters in Frankfurt. The organisation claims to have clandestine members and sympathisers in the Soviet Union. However, these have not normally come to official Western notice except when publicised by the Soviet authorities.

Montserrat

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the current per capita income of the lower income half of the population of Montserrat.

Mr. Eggar: The average per capita income of Montserrat is US$ 2,900. The current per capita income of the lower income half of the population is estimated at some 52 to 61 per cent. of the national average, that is within the range of US$ 1,500 to 1,800.

Turks and Caicos Islands

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government in relation to the sale of Crown land in the Turks and Caicos Islands.
